I am not intending to say that the committee were actuated by any improper motive, because I know that they were not. When I say I do not know what actuated them I mean to say that I do not know upon what principle of evidence this case was being conducted. Now, the committee report goes on to say that "this was denied by Wilson and by others." In other words, there is a large amount of testimony that Wilson had paid bribe money, but the committee reports that Wilson denies that, and consequently they are unable to find that the facts existed.

> This was denied by Wilson and by others, and after considering all the evidence on that subject, the committee are not prepared to find that the fact is established.

I do not know to what extent of proof the committee held the evidence was necessary to go in order to establish the fact. I judge that it might be contended that it should go to the point of proving corruption of the election beyond a reasonable doubt—the same as in a criminal trial in a court. I should judge, from the general tenor of this report, that was the rule adopted by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, since, notwithstanding these admissions, the committee could not find the fact of bribery was established, because they were subsequently retracted. Now, there is no such rule as that pertaining in this case. The rule in this case lies in the conscience and the judgment of the Members of this body. I say that a proper rule would be not only that it was not necessary to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the election was corrupt, but that if a reasonable doubt was cast upon its honesty, the seat should be vacated. No man should occupy a seat in this body when the majority of the Members of this body, who are forced to associate with him and transact a large amount of business on what is called senatorial courtesy, which is based upon senatorial honor, believe that there is a reasonable doubt as to whether his election was corrupt.

I can not see for myself, having been accustomed during a great part of my working period to study evidence, how a man can read the testimony already taken in this case and not say—whatever degree of proof may be necessary to establish the fact—that at least there was a reasonable doubt cast upon the honesty of this election. I think myself that it goes further, because I can not conceive in the first place of four men confessing falsely that they had accepted bribes. In the second place, nobody who values money as much as those who were paying this money is going to pay it over by the thousands of dollars unless it was necessary to secure the election. I do not think there is going to be any futile bribery going on, any money or large amount of money wasted in bribery. They usually figure those things pretty closely. It has gotten to be, not exactly common, but a familiar thing to see accounts stated of the amounts paid to the members of a legislature for their votes for United States Senators.

I am not going into a discussion at this time how we can be relieved from that situation. I believe myself we can be relieved from it without changing the essential nature of the Constitution, without changing the balance between the States and the Federal Government, by relieving the legislatures of the power of electing United States Senators, and by restoring it to the original source of power from which legislatures as well as the Senate derive their existence.

We are entitled to consider circumstances. Men are convicted of felonies of the gravest nature upon circumstantial evidence, and it is not necessary in this case to have direct evidence that the sitting Member participated, personally, in this bribery or that he knew of it personally. That fact can be found, as many a man has been convicted of murder, upon the circumstantial evidence in the case. There are certain circumstances in this case sufficient to convince a juror, in my judgment, that he did know it—the circumstance to which I have just referred.

Leaving out of the question the knowledge and participation of the sitting Member, suppose we admit, as has been admitted by many of the defenders of this case both here and elsewhere—admitted by those who have spoken upon this floor in behalf of the sitting Member from Illinois—that four members were bribed, yet contending that it was not quite enough bribery to unseat him——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. In a report in which I joined it is clearly stated:

> Four members of the general assembly which elected Mr. LORIMER testified to receiving money as a consideration for their votes. The members who thus confessed were—giving their names. It is also stated that not a sufficient number of members were shown to have been corrupted to affect the election.

The Senator from Washington would not dispute the legal proposition that if less than a sufficient number were shown to have been bribed, in the absence of any corruption on the part of the candidate, he should be unseated. The Senator would not undertake to say he should be unseated for less than a sufficient number?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not subscribe to the statement made by the Senator from Idaho. On the contrary, I do not say that in all cases he should be unseated, but I say that in many cases the situation might be such that the duty of the Senate would be to unseat him, although there was not evidence that he had personal knowledge of or participation in it, even though there was not proof that a sufficient number were bribed to overcome the majority he had.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator know of any case when such a rule was ever held in the history of civilized nations?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, I hope it will be held in this case.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know. It is evident that the Senator hopes it will be held in this case; that this case shall be exceptional.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think each case ought to stand upon the testimony in the particular case.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator for some years was a judge upon the bench. Did he have one rule of law in one case and one in another? I will take back that inquiry because I know he did not. I know, as a judge in determining matters or questions of law, or law applied to facts, or facts subjected to the law, he had a uniform rule of interpretation which he applied to those cases.

Now, the Senator would not contend for a different rule here. The rule is as well established as any rule in jurisprudence that where it is not claimed or shown that the candidate had any knowledge or any guilt in the matter the number of corrupt votes must have been sufficient to change the result of the election.

I signed the report with that in, as well as the supplemental report, which I thought covered some other questions. Now, would the Senator charge me with having held that if one-half of the members were corrupt it would not affect the election?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In answer to the Senator's question as to what a judge would do or what I may have done while on the bench I want to say that the Senator is entirely mistaken in supposing that I always held the same rule of law in the same class of cases. I remember some cases in which I granted new trials because I thought I had been mistaken about the rule of law in one case, and I think the supreme court reports of this country, both recent and old, are full of cases where different rules of law have been applied in the same class of cases because the judges had held one way in one case and another in a similar case. It is said that that was the situation in the Standard Oil decision just rendered.

It certainly was the case in the great Income Tax case, which was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and I differ with the Senator that the precedents of this body are so sacred that they can not be changed. They have at least no more weight than decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have in that tribunal as stare decisis.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, I merely suggest that I assume he would not like to be placed in the position of saying that the rules of law to be applied to controversies in court should not, or need not, be uniform.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suppose they are striving after uniformity in those cases in which there is so much lack of uniformity.

But it is not a question of law altogether, if it is at all. It is a question whether or not the bribery of four votes was sufficient to unseat the sitting Member. It is a question of fact, a question whether or not the election was procured by bribery, and whether or not the Senate can not infer upon the circumstances in the case that if there were four members bribed it was necessary to bribe them. At least it casts such a doubt upon the honesty of the election that the sitting Member should be unseated.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask just one concluding question. Would the Senator from Washington, were he sitting as a trial judge, arrive at a presumption or a conclusion that would be a presumption, if three men were being tried for a joint act, and the testimony showed that only two of them had anything to do with it, that the other one was necessarily guilty? Would he carry his presumption that far, that because four men were bribed, that of necessity some other number must have been bribed?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would carry the presumption to this extent—I do not like very much this idea of being put on trial as a judge, but I will answer——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment. The Senator, when I was occupying a position where to a large extent my hands and voice were tied, undertook to put me upon trial. That is the reason I appeared in the forum.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is nothing in that. The Senator knows and I know—every Senator knows—that he always has an opportunity to defend himself. He may be occupying the chair, but it is easy enough to leave the chair, as the Senator did leave it. The Senator asks a question and leaves the room before it is answered. I want to say in answer to the Senator's question that on the trial of a case in court if I found in a case that a juror was bribed by one of the parties I would not stop to inquire whether a sufficient number of them were bribed to find a verdict before finding him guilty or setting aside the verdict.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator this question: If it appeared in this case that four men were bribed, and that they had been bribed by one Wilson, and if it further appeared that Wilson denied paying those specific bribes, does he not think, as a lawyer, that it would be proper to inquire, even in an ordinary trial, whether at about the same time and under about the same circumstances Wilson had tried to bribe others in regard to other matters then pending, and if that would not throw some light upon the credibility or lack of credibility of his denial of guilt?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In a proceeding of this kind undoubtedly that inquiry should be made, and under the decision of a great many courts such testimony would be admissible, although there is a conflict of decisions upon that question at common law upon the matter of evidence. Some courts have held it was competent to show the commission of other crimes. Others have held it was not competent. But there are many other things upon which a verdict can be based besides that disclosed by the testimony in this case, and some of those are matters which have been admitted and boasted about on this floor.

Suppose, for instance, it was shown, as it is admitted here and apparently boasted of, that Lee O'Neil Browne controlled the Democratic members of the legislature; that he was their bellwether; that Lee O'Neil Browne had sufficient influence with the Democratic members of the Illinois Legislature to tell them how to vote for United States Senator without bribing them. I want to say to the Senate that under those circumstances it would have the same force and effect in morals and in law if the beneficiary of those votes bribed Lee O'Neil Browne alone, corrupted his vote, secured his support, knowing that the support of other members of the legislature would follow as a matter of course, as if they proceeded to bribe each individual Democratic member of the legislature.

I want to say, Senators, however much you may discredit and ridicule public opinion and public clamor, as it is called, that this thing of figuring betwixt tweedledum and tweedledee as to exactly how much bribery there was, as to what exact extent bribery was committed in the Legislature of Illinois, does not sit well with the great American people. As a matter of course you can not make powerful and dignified senates by constitutions, and you can not make them by the claims of the senate to dignity and power; you can not make them by conferring power upon them under the law or the Constitution. The only way that senates can have power and dignity and influence in the land, however much you may belittle and discredit public opinion, is by so conducting themselves, so purging themselves of corruption, wherever it appears, that they will command the confidence and the respect of this public opinion which some Senators seem so much to despise.

I want to say that it is asking a great deal of the people of a country supposed to be self-governing—and it is self-governing, because when the people in this country are once aroused they can control the Government by one means or another—I hope it will be according to the Constitution and with the ballot and in the ordinary forms of procedure—but when they are sufficiently interested, whether it be by that means or some other means, the people will control this Government—I want to say that it is asking a great deal of the people to have respect and confidence and obedience for the law that is made by the vote of a man who those people conscientiously and honestly believe, upon the testimony which has been introduced, to have secured his election to this body by guilty money, paid by private interests, seeking to control his vote in the making of the laws for the government of these people after he is elected. It is presuming that the people are long suffering and patient to a degree that no other people on the face of the earth have ever exhibited.

You can not maintain those conditions very long. There is a good deal of discontent, I am sorry to say, abroad. The duty of every patriotic man is to quiet it and to remove the causes of it. You can not remove it by the methods which have been used in the case now pending before the Senate, but you will increase it—you will accentuate this condition—people will become convinced, not by one case alone—it has been stated by Senators upon this floor that there were other cases—where a reasonable doubt is cast upon the question whether a Senator sitting as a Member of this body is free to vote in the making of laws according to the welfare of the public, or whether he is owned and controlled by some private party to vote to the detriment of the public, in the interest of the private party. It is asking a great deal to expect that the people will patiently and indefinitely give humble obedience to law enacted by his vote.

That is the situation which has been expressed here in other ways by many other Senators. It was expressed by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] when he said that he believed that the very existence of this body was involved in the decision of this question. That is the way it is involved. That is the manner in which the existence of this body will be attacked—by the loss of confidence and respect in its action on the part of the people.

You can not make a great nation by the accumulation of money, through monopolies or in any other way. I have not any objection to the accumulation of wealth, and the people of this country have not, but it does not constitute, it does not make in an essential degree toward a great nation. Nor does greatness depend upon military power. The Lord did not tell Abraham that his seed should grow into a great and mighty people because they would accumulate great wealth or because they would have great armies and great military prowess. But He told him that they would grow into a great and mighty people because they would do justice and render judgment. In other words, that the laws would be just and that they should be obeyed. There is a growing disrespect for the laws of this country, and it is the most evil tendency of the day. The country can not be maintained unless the confidence and respect of the people in law is maintained.

Long it has been a question before the people, and justly so, because public functions have been turned over to private interests. You have taken the public function of railroads and turned them over to the absolute, unrestricted control of private parties. The making of tariff laws which affect the welfare and business condition of every family in the land has been turned over very largely to the judgment and the influence of private parties. I have heard Senators in the discussion of tariff bills say, "Well, the committee reported this." If you investigate the proceedings of the committee you will find that some representative of a great monopoly, who was supposed to be an expert on the question, practically determined what the tariff rates should be. That is due to conditions that exist, not to any evil intent on the part of the legislators; but it has resulted in turning over to private parties the public function of levying customs duties, and the public function of operating the highways of the land, and the public property, the natural resources of the country, which should be disposed of under uniform and equitable laws for the benefit of all the people and to the largest number that could be benefited by them. But a few private individuals, many times by a perversion of the law, by fraud upon the law, have reaped the benefit. Those are some of the private interests which have reached their hands into the councils of Congress and the legislatures of the country.

That question is involved in the determination of this question—the inquiry into the validity of this seat, whether or not this seat is to be one which the private interests to which I have referred will control or whether it is to be one absolutely free to exercise judgment for the public welfare.

I myself saw this man Hines, spoken of so often in the testimony in this case—he is quite a conspicuous individual. I would not forget his countenance after my attention had been called to him—sitting in the reserved Speaker's seats in the gallery of the House of Representatives during the crisis of the consideration of the tariff upon lumber. There was no time during the deliberation of that body, in the critical periods of debate and taking of the vote upon the lumber tariff, but what if you cast your eye into the Speaker's gallery you would find Hines occupying one of the chairs. He is a familiar figure around Congress. It has been stated that he stood here in the Marble Room and had a line of couriers going between himself and Senators upon this floor during the consideration of the Lorimer case at the former session of Congress.

These are important reasons, Mr. President, for believing that it is essential and vital in the determination of this great question to refer it to a new committee. Many Senators may have formed an opinion, but have not committed themselves in writing to that opinion, and have no set determination as to the rules of evidence which should guide them.

It is human nature for a committee to defend its report which enunciated the principles upon which the inquiry was conducted. And in the face of public criticism, after they have been attacked for their judgment in that case by the people and by this body time and again, what would be the natural course for that committee to take? Human nature unconsciously will impel the members of it to stand by their former judgment and bolster up the record which they have made and fortify it. They would not go into it with an open mind. I say that human nature would impel them unconsciously to take such a course as that.

As a new Member of this body I must say—and sometimes perhaps we get a more disinterested view from a new Member or from a stranger rather than from those who are familiar by long years with the proceedings—that it is a strange spectacle to me to see distinguished and honorable Senators, members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who have filed this report and expressed the opinions I have read from that report, pleading with the Senate in person that this case should be referred to them. It strikes me as peculiar that they should want to have it referred to them. It seems to me that they would prefer to be relieved of the responsibility. If they go into this investigation they have got to do either one of two things in the face of this record, and either one of the two will put them into a disagreeable and a more or less humiliating position.

I say, without any reflection upon the committee, that either they have got to confess that the principles of evidence reported in their former hearings were wrong—not simply that they find a new verdict because there may be new evidence, for they can never find a different verdict if they follow the principles of evidence they have enunciated in their former report—but they have either got to repudiate the rules that they laid down in that case and admit that they were in error in this great case, or else they have got to be put in the position—and that is the worst feature of it, it seems to me—of yielding to public clamor; or else, on the other hand, find the same verdict according to the same rules of evidence and be subjected, on account of the criticisms in this case, to the charge that they were prejudiced because they had committed themselves to that view before.

It is strange, consequently, to me that they would be pleading in person with the Senate to refer this case to them. If I were in their position, I would be glad to be relieved of it; and I think, as a matter of fact, they would be. It is no reflection on them to refer it to a new committee.

I desire to record myself as being in favor of the resolution presented by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute submitted by the Senator from Virginia, and unless we come to a vote this afternoon I ask that it be printed and lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it a substitute or an amendment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is an amendment to the substitute.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out, on line 3, page 1, the word "forthwith" and insert the following:

to select and report to the Senate, within one week from the passage hereof, from their own membership, a special committee of not less than five Senators, which, upon confirmation by the Senate, shall be constituted a special committee of the Senate authorized and directed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the substitute.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I know that several Senators desire to be heard upon the various amendments and substitutes which have been offered. It is now 20 minutes of 6. It is not possible to conclude this debate to-night, even though we ran to a very early hour in the morning. Of that I am quite certain. The Senate has now been in session for a number of hours, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin withhold the motion? It is not debatable.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin withhold the motion?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Utah has something to propose other than debate, I will withhold it. If he proposes simply to debate, I will not withhold it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all; it was to debate it. I will not therefore ask the Senator to withhold it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, Shall the Senate now adjourn? [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will settle it quickest to have the yeas and nays on the question. I ask for a vote by yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when Mr. BRYAN'S name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. BRYAN] is necessarily detained from the Senate on account of serious illness in his family.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], but upon this question and all connected with it I am released. I vote "nay."

Mr. CUMMINS (when Mr. KENYON'S name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. KENYON] is unavoidably absent from the city.

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. KERN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. KERN] is unavoidably absent from the city.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I am not advised, on a question of this kind at least, how he would vote. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. FOSTER (when Mr. THORNTON'S name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. THORNTON] is absent on public business.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. WARREN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is necessarily detained from the Senate by public business.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], but under our agreement I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GORE. I am paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] concerning the Martin amendment. I withhold my vote in reference to adjournment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. As he is not here, I desire to withdraw my vote.

YEAS—19.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the substitute submitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I intend to detain the Senate for only a few moments.

I offered this amendment because I believe it should be the province of any member of the investigating committee to issue a subpœna and to further the inquiry which we are about to authorize in such a manner as he thinks best for the purpose of ascertaining the truth about this miserable affair; and my amendment simply gives to the individual members of this committee, if, as a whole, the Committee on Privileges and Elections shall be authorized to make the investigation, all the power and all the authority possible to obtain such information. Now, I desire to call the attention of Senators to the fact that the subcommittee which conducted this investigation before was composed at the time of but four or five members, only four of the present committee, at least. Two or three votes at times determined the relevancy and materiality of testimony, and I do not wish to leave it in the power of any majority of that committee to determine the scope or exact line of inquiry.

I am bound to say that much of the time of the previous investigation was consumed by Judge Hanecy, counsel for Mr. LORIMER, and Mr. Austrian in wrangling with one another in an attempt to befog the question. When the committee made its report I scanned every line with great care. I carefully read the testimony, and became satisfied that corruption laid at the foundation of Mr. LORIMER'S election, and I have seen no occasion to change my mind.

Thwarted, hindered, delayed by irrelevant argument which made the entire proceeding a mockery, I disagreed entirely with the course of the committee and their conclusions of law and fact, and voted my judgment at the time.

Mr. President, it is very plain that it is the purpose of the Senate to clothe the Committee on Privileges and Elections with the power and the authority to investigate this case again.

The scope of the resolution of the Senator from Virginia is broader than the resolution upon which the Senate committee previously acted. It authorizes an inquiry into the "jack pot," around which, in my opinion, all this later corruption centers; and in order that there may be no question about the right of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who was not then a member of the subcommittee, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] and other honored Senators who were not then members of the committee, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who was not a Member of the Senate, and the other new members of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections to go to the very bottom, unimpaired and unhampered by the rulings of a bare majority of its members, I have urged my amendment. I believe it will facilitate the investigation and fix responsibility on each member of the committee, resulting in a thorough investigation.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. As I understand the purpose of the Senator it is to give the opportunity for the widest scope of investigation. In other words, the design of the Senator is that if any one member of the committee desires to have a certain witness examined, that witness shall be called and examined. That is the purpose?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Exactly.

Mr. BACON. Now, the object of my interruption of the Senator is to suggest to him that possibly a different method might be more efficacious to accomplish that end. The plan proposed by the Senator from Michigan is to give to each member of the committee the power to issue a subpœna. I suggest to the Senator that that is an extremely unusual and inartistic method of procedure. Possibly it might be better for him to offer an amendment to the effect that every witness shall be called whom any member of the committee may desire to have called, and let the subpœna issue by the committee and not by the individual.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia. He has correctly described my purpose, and in the hasty preparation of it perhaps it is not quite sufficient to meet the purpose for which it is intended. I accept cheerfully the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, and will ask that the amendment be changed accordingly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator can formulate it.

Mr. GALLINGER. How will it then read?

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan if his amendment does not postpone any inquiry until after the adjournment of the session?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It does not. In fact it authorizes the inquiry to begin from the day the resolution is passed by the Senate, and it may be conducted during the sessions of the Senate during the present session of Congress, and if not finished it shall be conducted during the recess of the Senate, so that in any event it may not go beyond the coming recess. At least that was my purpose.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to have it read again.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan, with his permission, that the substitute covers that fully. The resolution which I hold in my hand reads this way:

That said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand; and that may take it over until the next session of the present Congress if the committee desire. That is the thing which I do not desire to have done. My amendment limits it to the present session and the approaching recess, if we shall have one.

Mr. BACON. But the language of the resolution is—

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, sitting in banc, be, and are hereby, authorized and directed forthwith to investigate whether——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; they may proceed forthwith, but under the terms of my amendment they must report at the latest at the beginning of the next regular session of this Congress.

Mr. BACON. I think the present language of the resolution covers all that is practicable. In line 6, page 2, it says "to administer oaths; and as early as practicable"——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but I definitely limit the time.

Mr. BACON (reading):

and as early as practicable to report the results of its investigation, including all testimony taken by it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I simply desire to say to the Senator from Georgia that it was my hope and purpose to facilitate an immediate inquiry, and that we might have a report at the present session or at least at the beginning of the next session of this Congress.

Mr. BACON. We all want it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But the resolution of the Senator from Virginia does not read that way.

Mr. BACON. But the language of the resolution is that the committee shall do it as soon as they can do it. Of course, if the committee is to act in good faith, it will report at the very first time that it is practicable to take the testimony and make the report. I do not see how we can add to the language. If the Senator wants to accomplish his purpose, the only way to do it would be to fix a certain date by which they must report, whether it is practicable to do it then or not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did fix the date by saying that they shall proceed during the present session of the Congress and during the coming recess, which exhausts the time before Congress shall meet again in December.

Mr. BACON. I hope they will not have to go into the recess. I hope they will furnish it before the recess——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. So do I.

Mr. BACON. Or before adjournment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And if the Senate favors the language of the Senator from Virginia, I will withdraw that part of my amendment.

Mr. STONE. The Senator could amend by inserting after the words "report as soon as practicable," the words "not later than the first day of the next session."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would the Senator from Virginia be willing to have that limitation in his resolution?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think that is simply an invitation to postpone it and do the work during the recess. The mere suggestion to them that they shall report not later than the next session of Congress is a suggestion that they are not expected to report earlier than the commencement of the next session of Congress. As the resolution reads, it requires them to commence at once and to report as soon as practicable. It could not do more than that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, Mr. President, I withdraw that part of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Michigan state the amendment as he now offers it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to have it read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read by the Secretary as modified.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 8, after the word "it," it is proposed to insert the following words:

And the said committee is hereby authorized and directed during the course of the investigation to issue a subpœna or a subpœna duces tecum to any witness whose presence is desired by any member of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the substitute resolution of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I could not clearly hear the amendment as stated by the Secretary, but it seems to me that it might be construed as a limitation rather than an enlargement of the powers of the committee; that is to say, it might be construed so that no other person could be called before the committee save one who is suggested by a member of the committee.

Mr. BACON. If it was favored by the entire committee it must be favored by some one member of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, Mr. President, there will be witnesses, I have no doubt, who will not be suggested by any member of the committee. I do not think the Senator from Michigan intends to put that limitation upon the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not. I want the widest possible scope. I thought this amendment would help it, and I believe it does.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, Mr. President, that would be a direct limitation upon the power of the committee instead of an enlargement of the power. I should prefer the original resolution rather than the amendment suggested by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am sure that the Senator from Michigan will find that his amendment is entirely unnecessary. I do not know that it will do any harm, but there is certainly ample provision in my resolution for the issuance of subpœnas, and I do not think the Senator from Michigan will strengthen the resolution by proposing that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the substitute resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. [Putting the question.]

The amendment to the proposed substitute was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I had expected when I offered my amendment to the substitute resolution of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] that the matter would not be passed upon to-day and I counted upon speaking at the next session. As, however, the disposition seems to be to dispose of the resolution at this session, I want to say a few words in support of the amendment which I have offered.

It is evident, Mr. President, that there are merits in both of the resolutions offered, the one by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the other by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. The particular merit possessed by the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia is that it recognizes the ordinary machinery of the Senate to carry out its purpose. To my mind the particular recommendation of the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is, first, that it provides for a small committee, and, in the second place, it provides for a committee with the particular special authority of the Senate.

Sir, it is the purpose of my amendment to combine and to harmonize, if possible, the most meritorious parts of both of these resolutions. I propose that the Committee on Privileges and Elections shall be instructed within one week to select from their membership a committee of at least five Senators, which committee, when reported to the Senate and confirmed by the Senate, shall constitute a special committee to take the evidence involved in this case.

It seems to me that my amendment recognizes as fully as the Committee on Privileges and Elections should require their authority and their function. It gives to them the nomination and the selection of the committee; it provides that the committee shall consist wholly of members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but it restricts the committee to such size as will result in giving the earliest possible effect to its investigation.

Mr. President, I undertake to say that it is practically impossible for this great committee of 15 members, sitting in banc, to take this testimony in any thorough way and digest and present it to this session of Congress. That is utterly impossible. At the last session a committee which consisted of only 13 members found it necessary to intrust the vital work of the committee to a subcommittee, which, I understand, consisted of 5 members, and not over 7 at the most.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The subcommittee consisted of 7 members.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am told it consisted of 7 members. If it was then necessary for that committee of 13 members to devolve the duties which it was supposed to exercise upon a subcommittee, it will be still more necessary for the present committee of 15 to do so.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. JONES. Would the Senator's committee, when selected out of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, then be expected to make its report to the Senate and not to the full Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. In other words, then, it would become a special and distinct committee of the Senate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It would.

Mr. JONES. I think that is a very good suggestion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And, Mr. President, that is necessary. It is well known now that we are likely, in the course of prosecuting this research, to run into men accused of serious crimes. The committee is likely to find itself confronted with the most serious difficulties in gathering testimony, and it will be, to my mind, the height of folly to intrust the great powers of this committee to a subcommittee, which has no legal authority to set in motion the machinery of contempt proceedings. It would inevitably result in delay.

Mr. President, I do not think there is in this situation any question of a disregard for the feelings of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. As I regard it, the Committee on Privileges and Elections is representative of the Senate: it is composed of some Senators who voted against LORIMER, of some Senators who voted for LORIMER, and of some Senators who were not in the Senate at the time the Lorimer case was tried.

If this great Committee on Privileges and Elections were intrusted with the responsibility and authority to select from its own membership a special committee of five or six or seven members, it is the most natural thing to suppose that it would select a representative committee—one that would commend itself to the intelligence of the Senate.

I repeat, Mr. President, it is unthinkable that a committee of 15 men, constituted practically of one-sixth of this whole Senate, should undertake seriously, sitting in banc, to investigate this great case. If the committee did so seriously, it would practically interfere with other legislation here, and I do not think it would be within the possibilities.

There is, however, another reason, Mr. President, why I think this small special committee should be selected in this way and confirmed by the Senate. I think the special committee should report to the Senate; it should not be a subcommittee to report to the main committee, and for this reason: Each Senator here, whether he be a senior Senator or a new Senator, has the same responsibility; he must approach this disagreeable task with the same sense of responsibility to his conscience and to the country; he comes here under his oath to pass upon the evidence, not as he thinks it to be, not as has been widely rumored it is, but he comes here to pass upon the evidence as the committee gathers it and brings it to the Senate; and he ought therefore to have a voice at least in the confirmation of that committee after it is selected from the membership of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. President, I have said that in my amendment I have sought to harmonize these two conflicting resolutions by selecting the parts of each which seem to me to commend themselves to fair-minded men. I think that we should recognize, to the extent that is done in my amendment, the natural machinery of the Senate, the Committee on Privileges and Elections; but I think also that we should remember that we stand here with responsibilities, and that we ought to have a voice in the selection of that committee or at least in its confirmation.

Mr. President, it is now two years since WILLIAM LORIMER took his seat in this body. This is not a case where we are examining evidence for the first time. Already the lapse of this long period, one-third of the term, presents to some extent a scandal in the country because of inaction. If urgency, if haste, were ever important, they are now doubly important because of the time which has already elapsed, and it seems to me that that fact argues strongly for a committee small enough to be able to work constantly, if necessary, during the remainder of the session or such length of time as may be sufficient to collect all the evidence. I think that every man we add to that committee will tend to lengthen out the time of the investigation. If we want haste, if we want prompt action, we must make the committee small enough to have its sessions practically continuous until the result is reached. At the proper time, Mr. President, I shall ask a yea and nay vote on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the substitute of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, when on the 22d instant I submitted a resolution to the Senate providing for the reopening of this case and the reference of it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I purposely avoided the subject of a subcommittee, thinking that if the resolution were adopted the committee itself would be obliged to select from among its members those who could more easily attend to the matter, and that it would then be time for them to report to the Senate their action, and ask for the same authority for that subcommittee that had been provided in the resolution for the full committee.

I noticed that when the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] submitted his resolution it was very similar to the one which I had presented, and I was very willing that mine should remain on the table, and that the resolution of the Senator from Virginia should be adopted, as I hope it will be adopted this afternoon.

In some respects it is broader than the resolution which I presented, and it was my desire and my purpose, if the investigation were committed to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to make it as broad and deep and searching and thorough as was possible; but it strikes me that it will be very much better, under the circumstances, to let the resolution of the Senator from Virginia be adopted as it stands and give the committee an opportunity to consider the matter. If they determine, as I expect they will—in fact, I do not see how they can do otherwise—that the work can better be done by a smaller body of men, let them so report to the Senate and ask for those whom they have selected the authority that will be necessary to carry on the work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Vermont to withdraw his resolution.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not presented it as a substitute resolution. The resolution is on the table, and I prefer the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the substitute of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, when this matter first came up for consideration in the Senate, my mind drifted in the direction of a method of procedure that would be recognized under all circumstances as absolutely fair, and one which would inspire the confidence of the entire country. I was opposed, therefore, to that portion of the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] which named the members of a select committee, for I thought that if a select committee was to be created, its members should be chosen in open session by the entire body of the Senate. Since that time the Senator from Wisconsin has modified his resolution by providing for that method of procedure, and it is my purpose to support his resolution thus modified.

I wish to say that I have the highest opinion of the character and ability of the members of the standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I would be the last man to cast any reflection upon the sincerity or the integrity of their action, but I differed with that committee at the last session of Congress. I believed that that committee was wrong in its conclusions, both as to the law and as to the facts, and as a new inquiry was to be made, the question in my mind was whether, believing, as I did, that the standing committee was wrong in the law and in its conclusion as to the facts, I could conscientiously refer the new inquiry to such committee, for those who voted against Mr. LORIMER have convictions as strong as those who voted for him. So I could not see how with propriety, having condemned the action of that committee on a previous occasion upon the inquiry then made, I could deliberately choose that committee as the instrument of the Senate to make an inquiry which would include not only the matters embraced in the old inquiry, but new matters.

I have long felt that the Senate was accustomed to adhere too much to traditions, to precedents, to senatorial courtesy, to a regard for the sensibilities of fellow Senators. I have never felt that it involved an attack upon the personnel of any committee or any Senator to move that a subject matter intrusted to a committee should be withdrawn from it and the committee discharged. I have always felt that a proper system of self-government required that we should consider a committee simply as a convenience of the Senate, as the servant of the Senate, subject to its will and command, and I have never hesitated to act in these matters regardless of the sensibilities of members of a committee with reference to matters of jurisdiction. A standing committee is a matter of convenience. It is in the power of the Senate at any time to withdraw a subject intrusted to such a committee, and it is in the power of the Senate at any time to select a new committee, a committee chosen for a particular purpose. Whilst I always wish to be courteous to fellow Senators and courteous to committees intrusted with certain matters under the jurisdiction laid on them by the Senate, I have never hesitated to exercise my right as a Senator wherever my convictions and my sense of propriety were involved, regardless of the jurisdiction of a particular committee. To act otherwise would be, in my judgment, to make the Senate the slave of its own organization.

Mr. President, what is the fair method of procedure in this matter? What will impress the country itself as fair? We are told that we should have no regard for public opinion or public clamor. That is true when we come to exercise the judicial function or the quasi-judicial function.

We should act upon the evidence and the law according to our convictions and our sense of duty, regardless of what public opinion may be, but as to the mere procedure under which the facts are to be ascertained and the law applied by a committee, it seems to me obvious that we should choose a method that will impress the public opinion of the country as a fair exercise of our power. It has seemed therefore to me that we should select a committee that had no share in the contention of the last session over this matter; that had no share in the personal feeling that was unhappily aroused during that contention; that we should select a committee which would have no pride of opinion regarding a previous decision, and which would be untrammeled by considerations of consistency, often so potent with the strongest of men.

We have fortunately in this body a number of Senators who have come fresh from the people, admirably trained for a duty of this kind, perhaps lacking in the experience regarding legislation which the older Members of this body who have had long service here have, but this is a subject that does not involve experience in legislation. It is a matter involving an investigation according to the forms of law by men trained in such investigations, and we have a number of Senators in this body who have freshly come to us, men of distinction at the bar, men who have been trained in investigations of this kind, who can discharge this duty just as well as the most experienced Senators in this body. Under the rule or tradition which assigns membership on the important committees in this body to men of long experience and on the minor committees, as a rule, to new men, such new Members have the time to devote themselves to this inquiry.

How is the Committee on Privileges and Elections made up? There are 3 of the members of that committee who are now engaged in the arduous work of the Finance Committee. It is clear that they should not be disengaged from that work. That leaves only 12 of the committee disengaged, and many of that 12 are assigned to very important committees in this body, which will be called upon to act if we should conclude to really serve the country by availing ourselves of the opportunity of this extra session to put upon the statute books measures which have been approved by public opinion and with reference to which Congress itself has been dilatory and negligent.

So far as the standing Committee on Elections is concerned, it is composed of 15, 3 of them new members, and of the remaining 12, 9, if I am correct, declared themselves at the last session in favor of Mr. LORIMER upon the law and the facts. I do not question that they were conscientious in their determination, just as conscientious as the men who voted against Mr. LORIMER, but having passed through those contentions, having been personally identified with them, would it be becoming in those of us who believe that their decision was wrong upon the facts and the law then presented to them to vote to turn over this entire inquiry to a committee so constituted? I do not think so. We have a responsibility in this matter, and our sincerity might well be doubted if, having this conviction and this responsibility, we should refuse to exercise it, forsooth, because the precedents of the Senate, or the good feeling of the Senate, or the courtesy of the Senate suggest that the ancient jurisdiction of this committee should be regarded.

This is my view regarding my personal action, and having this view, I shall vote for the modified resolution urged by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are demanded upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays? [After a pause.] There appears to be none.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not understand the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair called for an indication of those who supported the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that was not understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again put the question: Those who second the call for yeas and nays will indicate it by raising their hands. [After a pause.] Evidently not a sufficient number.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask for a count.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] A sufficient number. The yeas and nays are ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I will not vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when Mr. GORE's name was called). The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is paired for the day with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when Mr. RAYNER's name was called). The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] for the day upon this question.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce that I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). My colleague is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. WARREN's name was called). I again announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON]. Were he present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CUMMINS. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. KENYON]. I do not know how he would vote if he were here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. PERCY] is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In view of the announcement made by the senior Senator from Delaware, I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THORNTON]. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BRYAN], on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. Under our agreement, on any question not strictly political, either is at liberty to vote in the absence of the other, and in this particular instance I am assured that the Senator from Maine would have voted the same way that I have voted. So I will permit my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 55, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 30, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of the ages, our fathers' God and our God, we bless Thy holy name for the spirit of seventy-six, which moved our forefathers and our foremothers to deeds of heroism and glory, which gave to us the precious heritage, a Government of the people, by the people, for the people; and for the spirit of sixty-one which moved their sons and daughters to deeds of heroism and glory, which saved that Government from destruction. And grant, O most merciful Father, as these sacred Memorial Days recur, North and South, that the tears of the blue and the gray may mingle together over the graves of their precious dead; that if there were feelings of bitterness, animosity, hatred, they may be buried so deep that they never again can be resurrected; that Old Glory may float on in triumph, yet in peace, over a united country; one flag, one land, one heart, one hand, and one Nation evermore; and glory and honor be Thine forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, May 26, 1911, was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relative to the modification of the boundaries of the proposed Kilauea National Park in that Territory, which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Whereas a bill has been introduced into the Congress of the United States to authorize the establishing of a national park in the region of the active crater of Kilauea, in the island and county of Hawaii, of this Territory, to the end that the scenic wonders and volcanic phenomena of that region may be henceforth maintained as a public reservation for the benefit of all people and the enabling of scientific research of volcanic phenomena; and

Whereas in the message of the governor of the Territory to the present session of the legislature an expression of opinion by the legislature is suggested upon this important subject; and

Whereas it is further considered by the property owners and leaseholders that will be affected by the creation of this proposed park, as well as by the public at large, a laudable and praiseworthy purpose; and

Whereas it appears that the only opposition to the project is due to the boundaries of the park as in said bill described, which, it is claimed by the parties affected, are of greater magnitude than necessary for the object sought and unnecessarily take in large tracts of timber and grazing lands not essential to the creation of a "volcano park"; and

Whereas in order to allay any and all opposition to the general plan for a national park at Kilauea it is desirable to modify the boundaries defined in the bill introduced into the Congress of the United States for the creation of said park on lines that will retain within the boundaries of the proposed national park the whole of the crater of Kilauea and of Kilauea-iki and other volcanic phenomena in the vicinity, together with a right of way from said park lines to the crater of Mokuaweoweo, on the summit of Mauna Loa: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, petitioned and requested to create the said park on the lines or boundaries indicated on the memorandum and on the map attached, modifying, as shown thereon, the excessive area provided for in the original plan, it being evident that all opposition to the project will be then dissipated, and that the interests of all concerned, both public and private, will be the better subserved; and be it further

Resolved, That the superintendent of public works be instructed to immediately provide a technical description of the boundaries referred to in this resolution, as modifying the lines originally laid out, in order that the same may go forward with this resolution to Congress for its consideration and action; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, with said technical description, be transmitted to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress and also to the Delegate to Congress of this Territory.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not tell just when the next session will be. At the next session of Congress I would be prepared.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. No, sir; I mean the next session of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not tell just when that will be. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 291) providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the United States Navy and Marine Corps, and for the efficiency of the enlisted personnel, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PERKINS. At the request of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], I ask that the bill may go over without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

JOSEPH A. O'CONNOR.

The bill (S. 1237) for the promotion of Joseph A. O'Connor, carpenter in the United States Navy, to the rank of chief carpenter, and place him on the retired list, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to promote Carpenter Joseph A. O'Connor, United States Navy, retired, to the grade of chief carpenter on the retired list.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill goes over on the request of the Senator from Oklahoma. That concludes the calendar.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I call up Senate resolution No. 6.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Table Calendar 4, Senate resolution 6, by Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A resolution to appoint a special committee to investigate certain charges relative to the electon of WILLIAM LORIMER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The queston is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I favor the resolution introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] as modified by him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask the Senator from Oklahoma to yield to me while I offer the modification to the resolution which I introduced.

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma yields to the Senator from Wisconsin to modify his resolution in the manner which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," in line 1, page 2, down to and including the word "hereby," in line 4, and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

That a committee composed of five Members of the Senate, three of whom shall be of the majority and two of the minority party, shall be elected in the open session by roll call, and when so elected said committee be, and it is hereby.

Also by inserting, before the word "investigate," in line 2, page 2, the word "promptly."

Also to add at the end of the resolution the following:

In electing said committee a majority of those present and voting shall be required to elect. Each Senator may vote for five upon the first roll call, and thereafter for such number as have not received the requisite majority. No Senator who was a Member of the Senate on the 3d day of March, 1911, shall be eligible to a place upon such committee, and any votes cast for such a Senator shall be void.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution in the form that it is now presented.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Whereas the Senate, by resolution adopted on the 20th day of June, 1910, authorized and directed the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges against WILLIAM LORIMER, a Senator from the State of Illinois, and to report to the Senate whether, in the election of said LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from said State of Illinois, there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices; and

Whereas said committee, pursuant to said resolution, took the testimony of a large number of witnesses, reduced the testimony to printed form, and reported the same to the Senate, which was thereafter considered and acted upon by the Senate; and

Whereas the Illinois State senate thereafter appointed a committee to investigate like charges against WILLIAM LORIMER and to report to said State senate whether in the election of said LORIMER to the United States Senate corrupt methods and practices were employed and used; and

Whereas as it appears from the published reports of the proceedings of the said Illinois State senate committee that witnesses who were not called and sworn by the committee of this Senate appointed to investigate said charges have appeared before the said committee of the Illinois State senate, and upon being interrogated have given important material testimony tending to prove that $100,000 was corruptly expended to secure the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee composed of five members of the Senate, three of whom shall be of the majority and two of the minority party, shall be elected in the open session by roll call, and when so elected said committee be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to promptly investigate and report to the Senate whether in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices; that said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress, to hold sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation, to employ stenographers, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to report the results of its investigation, including all testimony taken by it; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

In electing said committee a majority of those present and voting shall be required to elect. Each Senator may vote for five upon the first roll call, and thereafter for such number as have not received the requisite majority. No Senator who was a Member of the Senate on the 3d day of March, 1911, shall be eligible to a place upon such committee, and any votes cast for such a Senator shall be void.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document the testimony taken by the senate committee of the Illinois Legislature in the senate bribery investigation of the Forty-seventh General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

I wish to say, Mr. President, in making this request, that the testimony is complete, as I believe, excepting that it does not begin with the first session of that committee. My attention was attracted to the investigation by the published statement that Mr. Kohlsaat had been subpœnaed before the committee and had refused to answer certain questions. The committee, as announced in the newspapers, adjourned for something like a week. I then requested that a certified copy of the testimony taken by the committee be transmitted to me. Thereafter I received in sections, at the conclusion of each sitting of the committee, the testimony, which I have before me here. Each section of the testimony as transmitted to me has attached to it the following:

STATE OF ILLINOIS, County of Sangamon, ss:

Charles L. Binns, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a shorthand reporter, residing at Chicago, Ill.; that he is the official reporter for a committee appointed under senate resolution No. 17 for the purpose of investigating alleged acts of bribery and official misconduct of members of the Forty-seventh and Forty-sixth General Assemblies of the State of Illinois; that on the 28th day of March, 1911, he made shorthand notes of the testimony given by Edward Hines before said committee; that on April 5, 1911, he made shorthand notes of testimony given by H. H. Kohlsaat and Clarence S. Funk; that he subsequently transcribed said shorthand notes, and that the foregoing is a full, true, and correct transcript of said shorthand notes.

CHARLES L. BINNS.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 5th day of April, A. D. 1911.

WILLIAM O. HOLMBERG,
Notary Public.

A similar affidavit or verification is attached to each one of the sections of testimony as I received it.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In just a moment. I shall endeavor, Mr. President, to procure the testimony taken prior to that which I first received. The first section of the testimony which I received is marked page 22. I think there was one session, perhaps two sessions, of this senate investigating committee held prior to the date covered by the first section of testimony which I received. I shall endeavor to make that complete, although I think this covers all the testimony which is of any materiality or importance taken by this committee, and covers, I believe, all the testimony taken by this committee on and after the 5th day of April. I ask to have it printed as a Senate document for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWN. I desire to ask the Senator a question, if he will permit. I do not know whether I understood the Senator clearly, but I ask, does the man who authenticates the correctness of the transcript of the testimony say that he is the official reporter of the committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He so states. I quote from the verification, which reads:

Charles L. Binns, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a shorthand reporter, residing at Chicago, Ill; that he is the official reporter for a committee appointed under senate resolution No. 17, and so forth.

That is the resolution, I will say to the Senator, under which this investigation was conducted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice that the resolution of the Illinois Legislature, as published in the papers, provides—

That the secretary of this senate be,—

That is the senate of the Illinois Legislature—and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transmit to the Senate of the United States a copy of the evidence taken by the said committee, together with the report and findings of that committee, and a copy of this resolution for such action as the Senate of the United States may deem proper.

I should like to inquire, Mr. President, if that official document has been received by the Senate?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will state that I am informed at the desk that it has not been received, and that was one reason for asking to have this testimony printed, because Senators had requested the opportunity to examine the testimony in full. I made as faithful and complete an abstract of the testimony as I could, and presented it to the Senate in the remarks which I submitted several days ago and which will appear in the RECORD in a day or two.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that the official report ought to be printed. If there is an official report of the proceedings of the committee of the senate of the Illinois Legislature, and if it is to be presented to the Senate, then it would of necessity be printed, but I can not see why there should be two prints of those proceedings.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I will say that I have no information whatever as to the occasion of the delay, if it may be called delay, in transmitting to the Senate the resolution adopted by the Illinois senate, together with the testimony taken and reported by the committee of that body; but it is not here. In the course of my remarks upon this case I said I should ask to have this testimony printed in full; but before I concluded I received a certified copy of the resolution adopted by the Illinois senate, and I apprehended each day that the testimony would reach the Senate. That was one of the reasons I did not ask to have this testimony printed as a Senate document earlier. The other was that I retained it to compare it, as I found time to look over the reporters' notes, with the excerpts of testimony which I had taken from this record and used on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. CULLOM. When the Senator from Wisconsin first addressed the Senate on this subject I listened to hear him state whether he had a certified copy of that record. I did not understand that he had. Some days ago I wrote to one of the members of the committee of the Illinois Legislature who made the investigation and inquired whether it had been sent. I have not heard from him. I advised him that the full testimony, the whole record, ought to be sent, so that the Senate might have it before it. I hope that it will be received very soon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want to say, in reply to the Senator from Illinois, that I have a verified copy of the testimony, which covers, I am confident, the full testimony of every important witness called before that committee; otherwise I would not ask, Mr. President, to have it printed as a Senate document. Because of the delay in the arrival of the official record, and because Senators have asked me to give them the opportunity to see this testimony, it seemed to me that I ought to ask to have it printed as a Senate document.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand from the remarks of the Senator this morning that there is perhaps one chapter of the testimony not here.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know there is, Mr. President, but, judging from the press reports made of the hearings before the committee, I do not think that was an important session of the committee. I believe it was the session of the committee at which Mr. Kohlsaat refused to answer. Then the committee took an adjournment of about a week to give him an opportunity to reflect and consider whether he would answer, and at the next hearing, I think, the real testimony taken by this committee began.

Mr. CULLOM. I remember the story as to the testimony of Mr. Kohlsaat, but I do not know whether or not anything occurred at that session of the committee that we ought to have before us. I think myself that the whole record of the proceedings of the legislative session, so far at least as the senate is concerned, ought to be before us.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me say, Mr. President, that I do not offer this to supplant or take the place of the official testimony, which will later be received, but I offer it to have it printed for the present information of the Senate, because I have been requested so to do, and while it may duplicate some printing by the Senate, I believe in this important case that I am warranted in asking for it.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to having it all printed.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. ROOT. I make this suggestion, that we order this printing now, with the understanding that if, before the final striking off of the copies, the official document is received from the secretary of the Illinois senate, that the print be corrected so as to be made a print of the official document.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that, Mr. President, is a very good suggestion.

Mr. ROOT. It is very probable that this is a matter of a few days, and, of course, it is rather desirable to avoid the confusion of having two documents, but I would not postpone the printing of this substantial matter very long on account of it. If the order can be made with that understanding, it may help us out of the difficulty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, if I understand aright, the Senator from New York does not suggest that the printing of this testimony be delayed.

Mr. ROOT. No.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But that if, while it is being put in type and before it is printed, the official record is received, then the comparison be made, and the official record be made to take the place of the printing done under the unanimous-consent agreement, which I now request.

Mr. ROOT. That is my suggestion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In that way the Senate will receive it quicker. I submit the request in that form.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have it distinctly understood that in printing the report it is printed as an unofficial report, and then when the official report is received print it in full as the official report. If the Senator from Wisconsin has no objection to that understanding, I will not object to the printing of the report.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If before this can be printed and returned by the Public Printer the official record is received, as I understood the suggestion of the Senator from New York—and it seemed to me a very excellent one—it was this: That upon the official record being received a comparison be made while this was still in proof and any corrections necessary be made, so as to conform to the official record. Then it might be printed as the official record and save duplication.

Mr. SMOOT. That is perfectly satisfactory to me; but if the official record does not come before that document is issued from the Printing Office I would like to have it designated as the unofficial report, and when the official report arrives have it printed as the official report.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let it be printed if it can be——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a moment. Let me respond to the suggestion of the Senator from Utah. Let it be printed as upon my request, and it will show upon the certificate or verification of the official reporter just how much importance should be attached to it. It would not be called, of course, the official record, because it is not transmitted here by the secretary of state or by the secretary of the senate of the State of Illinois, from one or the other of which officials, I presume, the official record will be received by the Senate in due course.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should object to printing an unofficial record of a matter so important. It does not purport to be a complete record, and if I correctly heard the reading of the certificate of the stenographer, he does not say that no other or further testimony was introduced or received before that committee. He merely certifies that that to which he places his certificate is correct.

The Senate will doubtless want to know all that occurred before that committee, and it should not come under the certificate of the stenographer. The certificate of the stenographer is all right if it is full enough, but the record should come to us, coming, as it does, pursuant to the resolution of the Legislature of Illinois, with the certificate of the secretary of state. If this which is admitted not to be a complete report goes out, those who receive it will doubtless never receive the official report, and they may or may not get wrong impressions as to what occurred.

I had supposed that the official report was here. I would have no objections, of course, to printing it; think it should be printed immediately; and if there is delay it can readily be remedied through the officers of this body by a telegram to know whether it has been sent.

Should we commence printing so large a document and one that might be so misleading—I do not attach any personal question to that—as to make it necessary for a part of the people to examine the record twice and compare them one with the other? There should be but one record of a matter of this importance. It should be the official record. And, of course, I imagine there will be no objection whatever, when it comes in, to printing it. We are all very much interested in that record, but we want to know that it is the record of all the proceedings.

I shall be constrained, not from any personal motives, but in the interest of having but one record and having that a correct record, to object, and I do object, to the printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I may take occasion to put this matter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD before the debate closes if the other testimony does not arrive.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin if the testimony he has asked to have printed to-day for the information of the Senate is not the same testimony that he discussed in his remarks last week on this question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is, Mr. President.

Mr. BROWN. It does seem to me that the Senator from Idaho ought to allow, for the convenience and information of Senators, this to be printed as a public document. Nobody here denies that, so far as it goes, this transcript is correct. If this is a correct transcript of the testimony of these important witnesses, I want to know how a Senator can justify an objection to allowing it to be printed, so that the Senators may have it for their own information.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. I will not yield for a moment. We are discussing here now a very important question, and one which necessarily involves what happened before this committee of the Illinois senate. We have it undisputed here that that senate, by a vote, instructed one of its administrative officers to communicate that testimony to this body. That report has not arrived here yet, but we do have in lieu of it a volume of testimony from witnesses who were heard by that committee; the correctness of the testimony is unquestioned; and I appeal to the Senate to allow the Senators to have that in print for our guidance, for our information, and that we may consider these resolutions with some intelligence.

Mr. CURTIS and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Oklahoma yield, or does he yield the floor?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma yields to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I was merely going to say, in connection with the matter we have just been discussing, I hope the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] will be willing to withdraw his objection. It really seems to me not very important whether we print an incomplete record now and a full record a little later, and it is very desirable that this mass of testimony which we have here should be printed without unreasonable delay. The full record will undoubtedly come, and can then be printed, and if we should have two documents I do not see what great harm is done. We occasionally duplicate in our printing. I sincerely hope that the request of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] will be granted and that this testimony will be printed.

Mr. CURTIS and Mr. BAILEY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he has——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma surrender the floor?

Mr. OWEN. I surrender the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has been demanding the floor for some little time before the Senator from Texas rose.

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I will wait my order. What I wanted to know was if any Senator had any information which explains or excuses the delay of the Illinois senate in forwarding this testimony.

Mr. CURTIS. I was going to suggest that the Secretary of the Senate or the chairman of the committee be authorized to wire the secretary of state of Illinois. Perhaps in that way we could find out something about this testimony and obtain some information as to about when it will be sent to the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to make one remark?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. I wrote two or three days ago to one of the members of the committee, asking why this record has not been received and telling him it ought to be here.

Mr. BAILEY. This all illustrates the difficulties into which we fall when we depart from the orderly procedure of the Senate. Had we waited until this matter had come and referred it you would not have had this altercation. The committee has not forwarded the testimony, and so far as I know has never forwarded an engrossed copy of the resolutions which were adopted by the senate of Illinois. Yet they have advertised that fact to the country, and I think we are entitled, in the absence of the official proceedings of the committee, to print what we have; and I myself hope the Senator from Idaho will withdraw his objection.

Mr. CULLOM. So do I.

Mr. BAILEY. It can do no harm, because at last this will be printed at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and when the matter comes in the due course of affairs from the committee of the Illinois senate or from the senate itself, it will be printed as another document, a separate document, and any discrepancies that may exist between the two reports will be discovered. I can not see any possible harm that it can do to print it, and I can see a good deal of good because in the meantime Senators who are interested in this matter can advise themselves.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want Senators to advise themselves; but I want them to advise themselves from a record in proper form. I agree with the Senator from Texas that it is always better to adhere to regularity of procedure, and that this matter should come from the proper certifying officers of the State of Illinois or it should not come at all.

The Senator from Wisconsin does not contend that this is a complete record. He admits that two sessions of the committee are not included in the record. What Senator familiar with proceedings in court would permit one party on appeal to file a record that was not in conformity with procedure and then say, "If this is not correct, you can discover the discrepancies by a subsequent comparison"?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment. This record will be printed, and it will be immediately available to the outside world. This case has become sensational, and it is being tried everywhere else quite as much as in the Senate. A record goes out that perhaps may not contain some matters of grave importance. Parties who receive it will never know at all that they are being misled.

Mr. BAILEY. But, Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Wisconsin has the certificate that this part of the record which he presents is correct, and I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say—and I am perfectly willing to accept his statement on that point—that the sessions of the committee not reported are not important. It matters not whether important or unimportant; when the whole record is made up the Senate will judge for itself.

Now, I want to say to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that while I am not indifferent to the trial of this case, which seems to be in progress throughout the land, I am not to be influenced by it one way or the other, and I assume that I am not different from other Senators. We will at last, no matter what our feelings may be, no matter what our prejudices may be, if we have any, decide this case upon the law and the evidence.

I think the Senator from Idaho would not object, if he were trying a case, to print the record from day to day, so that he would have the evidence before him.

We are having hearings before the Finance Committee, and for the convenience of the committee we have been printing the record from day to day, so that members of the committee may keep themselves advised as the hearing proceeds. I have no hesitation in saying that if this matter had been before the Senate, or a committee of the Senate, I would be glad to have the evidence printed from day to day, so that at the beginning of each session of the committee we would have before us the testimony of the preceding session.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps I can offer a suggestion to the Senator from Wisconsin which, if he would accept it, would obviate the objection the Senator from Idaho has. Would the Senator from Wisconsin make a request that the report be printed for the use of the committee instead of as a public document? Then it would be confined to the use of Senators, and it would not go to all the depository libraries in the country. If published as a public document the Senate would get only 150 copies, and a given number would go to the House, some to every depository library in the United States, and a few copies to every one of the departments; whereas if he requests that it be printed for the use of the committee, every Senator can secure it for his use, and it would not become a public document. Then when the official report arrives let the Senator from Wisconsin ask that the official report be printed as a public document, and there will be no question about the Senate agreeing to same.

If the Senator would accept the suggestion I believe that it would meet the objection of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not accept the suggestion of the Senator from Utah. I sincerely hope this resolution will never go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It is a matter of utter indifference to me whether the Senate prints this testimony or not. I have had the opportunity to examine it, and as it was being taken I became convinced that it was my duty as a Senator to offer the resolution which I offered, whether it was regular or not. I think it was regular. If other Senators are to be put on trial here in this case I am entirely willing to come to the bar of this Senate, along with the committee that had charge of this case. I withdraw the request which I made for the printing of this document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his request.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin be good enough to tell me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. The date of the first session of that committee? My impression is it is some time——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have the date of verification to this first section of the testimony which I have received. It is the 5th day of April. The stenographer swears that he is the official stenographer; says that "the foregoing is a full, true, and correct transcript of his shorthand notes made of the hearing had upon that day." That was the day the testimony of H. H. Kohlsaat, Clarence Funk, and Edward Hines was taken.

I am certain, Mr. President, that that was the first time Edward Hines had been called before the committee, the first time Mr. Funk had been called before the committee, and the second time Mr. Kohlsaat had been called before the committee. The first time the examination was very brief, as indicated at least by the press report, he refusing to answer. The Senator from Texas may remember having seen some account of it. It was the press report that first attracted my attention to it. Then I asked to have a certified copy of the notes taken sent to me. I made the request to have this transcript printed because Senators have asked me to make it, and I am sorry to have taken up the time of the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. I was one of the Senators who asked the Senator from Wisconsin to have it printed, and I am of opinion that it ought to be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had in mind when a request was made to print it as a Senate document the result which would flow from that action on the part of the Senate. Senate documents are distributed under the law to the public libraries and distributed throughout many sources as public information reliably stamped with the Senate's guaranty.

Now, I shall not object to the printing of that testimony for the use of a committee, but I object to its being and purporting to be a record in the public libraries throughout the country of the testimony taken. I shall not object to the printing of the testimony of persons before that committee to be deposited anywhere in the world when it is certified in a proper manner. The Senator from Wisconsin admits that sessions of the Senate are not included in it.

The people reached by a Senate document should be accurately and fully informed. I had it in my mind when I rose to send it over until to-morrow; and, I presume, by to-morrow morning the same Senator, or more, perhaps, will have accurate information as to the stage of the work necessary to carry out the instructions of the legislature to this Senate, by furnishing with a certified copy of the resolution of the senate of Illinois, a certified copy of all the proceedings. Is not that an orderly way to proceed?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that 200 copies of the testimony be printed for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that 200 copies of the document which the Senator from Wisconsin has upon his desk be printed for the use of the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is entitled to the floor. Will he yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 58), as follows:

Resolved, That the testimony before the committee of the Illinois senate presented by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] be printed as a public document.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the resolution may lie over one day.

Mr. ROOT. We can deal with it then by a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the resolution will lie over.

Mr. ROOT. I ask unanimous consent, with the courtesy of the Senator from Oklahoma, to introduce the following resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 59), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is, instructed to inform the secretary of the Illinois senate that the resolutions of the Illinois senate of May 18, 1911, have been informally brought to the notice of the Senate of the United States, and that possession of an official copy of the evidence and record therein referred to would facilitate the action of the Senate of the United States in regard to the subject matter of the resolutions.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from New York that communication be made by wire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair assumes that the Secretary of the Senate would so communicate.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is nothing in the resolution to cover it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New York modify the resolution so as to provide that the communication shall be by wire?

Mr. ROOT. I will do so, by inserting the words "by wire" after the words "secretary of the Illinois senate."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma will proceed.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, there are two resolutions before the Senate proposing a reinvestigation of the Lorimer case. First, the one introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] proposes that a committee shall be appointed by this body of Members who took no part in determining the previous controversy of the Lorimer case. The second resolution, offered as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin and presented by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], refers this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections of 16 members, providing that they shall sit en banc. Of these two resolutions, I prefer that of the Senator from Wisconsin, for the reason that I believe this investigation should be conducted by a committee which took no part in the previous decision. There are 20 new Senators, I believe, from whom such an independent committee could be chosen.

I do not think that this question should be referred to a committee composed entirely of those who supported Mr. LORIMER in the previous investigation and determination of this case. I do not think it would be just under the circumstances to have a committee composed entirely of those who voted against Mr. LORIMER. I should prefer a committee of Members who took no part for or against Mr. LORIMER in the previous judgment on his case. I can see no good reason why the Senate should not select a committee which has taken no part in this matter.

I think, moreover, it would have an unfavorable effect upon the standing of the Senate itself before the people of the United States to refer this question now to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for the very reason that seven of the members of that committee made speeches in favor of Mr. LORIMER, and nine of them voted for Mr. LORIMER upon the previous record. There are only three new members of that committee and only three members of the committee who voted against Mr. LORIMER on the previous record.

Even if it were otherwise justified to select a committee overwhelmingly composed of those who supported LORIMER on the previous bad record, it will not look right to the public, and I believe the United States Senate should not only avoid evil, but should avoid the appearance of evil.

It is all very well to say that the members of this committee will discharge their proper function without bias, without being influenced by what they have heretofore said on this record; without being influenced by any prejudice in their point of view, but if that be true, and if it prove true, it will be contrary to the law of psychology, which ordinarily influences the minds of men.

In this connection I want to call the attention of the Senate to the remarkable record of the electoral commission of 1877. That commission was composed of five Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States—Hon. Joseph P. Bradley, Hon. Nathan Clifford, Hon. Samuel F. Miller, Hon. Stephen J. Field, and Hon. W. Strong; five distinguished United States Senators—Edmunds, Morton, Frelinghuysen, Thurman, and Bayard; and five great leaders of the House of Representatives—Mr. Payne, Mr. Hunton, Mr. Abbott, Mr. Garfield, and Mr. Hoar. This distinguished commission passed upon four contested-electoral cases involving the electoral vote of Oregon, of South Carolina, of Louisiana, and of Florida, a voluminous record, involving many difficult questions, and the remarkable result followed that every one of the 15 followed his previous political predilection, and by a decision of 8 to 7 decided every point of importance in that case and decided the result in each of the four cases in the strictest accord with the previous political opinion of each of these 15 judges sitting upon that electoral commission to determine the Presidency of the United States in the Tilden and Hayes controversy.

It is not necessary to question the integrity of purpose or the sincerity of judgment of any one of the seven great Democrats who sat on that electoral commission nor of the eight distinguished Republicans who sat on it, but it taught a lesson to this country that men are profoundly influenced by their previous judgment. In this case it is, I believe, the open purpose, not expressed in the record, but understood, I think, that this reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections really means that the Committee on Privileges and Elections will report back for confirmation a new special committee of eight members and that four Senators who supported LORIMER shall be put upon the new special committee to be named by the Senate, one Senator who voted against him, and three Senators who took no part in it. That is to be, as I understand, the construction of this proposed committee. I see no sound reason why the Senate should abdicate its powers and delegate the selection of this special committee to a committee whose membership overwhelmingly supported LORIMER on the previous gross record of fraud. I do not think the people of the United States will approve the reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and yet, Mr. President, I am willing to believe that if it is so referred that committee will discharge its duty. But we must always remember it will discharge its duty as the committee sees that duty. Four members of the proposed special committee (comprising half of the proposed special committee) have heretofore expressed views which are greatly at variance with my opinion as to what is the law and as to what are the facts developed by the record in the Lorimer case.

The action taken by the committee in its previous report to the Senate I did not criticize in discussing the Lorimer case any further than I could possibly help, but I thought the committee was in grave error in a number of important particulars.

In the first place, I do not think the committee followed out the scope of the resolution of June 20, 1910, under which they were instructed by the Senate to report to this body. The resolution of June 20, 1910, under which the committee was to report, reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized and directed to investigate certain charges against WILLIAM LORIMER, a Senator from the State of Illinois, and to report to the Senate whether, in the election of said William Lorimer as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois, there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices.

The committee, in its official report, failed to quote the resolution under which they acted. On the contrary, they quoted the resolution of May 28, 1910, submitted by Mr. LORIMER, and the committee abstracted the resolution of June 20, 1910, as follows:

On the 20th day of June, 1910, the Senate adopted a resolution authorizing and directing said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, to investigate said charges.

It says nothing about the further instruction to report to the Senate whether or not "there were any corrupt methods and practices employed," and the committee did not report whether, in their opinion, there were corrupt methods and practices employed. They reported, on the contrary, that according to the precedents the law of the case is this—it must be made to appear in order to invalidate a seat:

(1) That the person elected participated in one or more acts of bribery or attempted bribery, or sanctioned or encouraged the same; or
(2) That by bribery or corrupt practices enough votes were obtained for him to change the result of the election.

This report was not responsive to the instruction of the Senate, but that was the basis of law upon which the committee based its report. The question as to these corrupt practices, the extent of the corrupt methods and practices, was not reported on and presented to the Senate as a guide to its action, except, perhaps, as the volume of 700 pages of evidence might disclose. On the contrary, the committee found that in their opinion, upon the evidence and under this statement of the law, the validity of the seat of the Senator from Illinois had not been successfully assailed. This attitude of the committee was and is indefensible and should not be confirmed by this committee nor by the Senate.

In the second place, the committee instructed to prosecute the inquiry put their own duty of conducting the inquiry on a Mr. Austrian, an attorney who appeared to have been employed by a newspaper—the Chicago Tribune. Upon him was put the burden of conducting this inquiry. I think this was a serious error, which I should not like to see repeated in kind.

In the third place, the committee seemed to think they were sitting as judges on a controversy between private citizens assailing the right of Mr. LORIMER to retain his seat, instead of being charged by the Senate with the grave duty of determining whether or not there had been used corrupt practices in obtaining a seat on the floor of the most important legislative body in the world.

In the fourth place, the committee not only did not pursue, obtain, and compel evidence in the line of this investigation, as directed by the Senate, but permitted witnesses to avoid giving evidence which might have led to a proper development of the truth.

In the fifth place, the committee failed to summon the most important witnesses and compel their testimony.

They did not summon Mr. Edward C. Hines, although Mr. Hines was recognized in his activity in this matter and had been charged in the public press previously with having had an active hand in the Lorimer election. Mr. Hines was constantly in the galleries and reception room of this body taking an active part in conducting a lobby in this behalf, as I am informed and believe.

Mr. LORIMER himself was not required to give testimony, which I thought a very grave omission, and the 30, 40, or 50 members of the bipartisan jack-pot combination in the Illinois Legislature were not summoned before the committee. The committee actually declined to pursue this inquiry, even after evidence had been submitted showing that the jack-pot money was used in obtaining the election of Mr. LORIMER.

In the sixth place, the committee permitted the counsel of Mr. LORIMER and of the Chicago Tribune to fill the record and consume the time of the committee in immaterial and irrelevant discussion as to whether or not certain testimony was material, relevant, or admissible before an investigating committee, applying the highly technical rules of law that would be invoked in a criminal trial, and which had no proper place before a committee of investigation charged with inquisitorial powers and duties.

In the seventh place, the committee made arguments in favor of Mr. LORIMER that I think utterly unsound, the most egregious of which, perhaps, was that even if 7 votes had been corrupted, these 7 votes would have to be deducted, not only from the number of those who voted for LORIMER, 108, but also from the total vote, 202, on the theory that if a majority of the honest, uncorrupted votes, or votes not proved to have been corrupted, should elect a Senator to the United States Senate it would give him valid title.

If the Lumber Trust had desired to buy a seat for Mr. Hopkins, this doctrine would have permitted the Lumber Trust to have bought 24 votes that were cast for Stringer and 39 votes that were cast for LORIMER, and paid them a thousand dollars each to absent themselves, and having thus bought 63 votes, and each bribe taker having confessed in open court, they could have thus procured the election of Mr. Hopkins, who would have had 70 honest votes under this proposal, leaving Mr. LORIMER or any other candidate with 69 honest votes, and thus seat Mr. Hopkins and give him a good title to a seat on the floor of the United States Senate that could not be assailed, although 63 men had confessed their bribery before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate.

What kind of doctrine is this? I am not willing to submit this case to a committee entertaining such views or defending such views on the floor of the Senate, and I do not believe the people of the United States will approve it. Why should a committee which asserts such a doctrine have control over a further inquiry into the same case?

Under the doctrine of a "majority of the honest votes" being sufficient, the Lumber Trust could have openly bribed 100 votes of the Illinois Legislature to absent themselves and have thus elected Mr. LORIMER a United States Senator by the votes of the 52 Democrats who voted for him in the Illinois Legislature, whose corruption was not established. What kind of doctrine is this, and why should we place in the hands of a committee that entertains such a view and defends it on the floor of the Senate the control of this investigation?

I can not consent to nor will I be placed in the attitude of unfriendliness to this committee. I am personally friendly to it. I sincerely respect the committee, but the views of the committee do not commend themselves to me. I am not willing to have a new special committee, with one-half of its members committed to a doctrine of such character, make another report to the Senate of the United States that shall confirm the same views. I should hope that, upon reflection and consideration, every member of that committee would realize that this doctrine is unsound. When applied to one or two votes or even to 7 votes it does not seem to be so egregious, but when you apply it, the principle asserted, to half of a legislature, leaving only a quorum present, it becomes so shocking as to be revolting.

Mr. President, the doctrine of a mere majority of the uncorrupted votes giving a valid title to a seat on the floor of the United States Senate is untenable, is unsound, and full of dangerous and mischievous consequences. It might easily lead to the corruption of other legislatures and the election of other Senators by the sinister forces of this Republic. It might lead to wholesale bribery and corruption.

Eighth. Mr. President, I think the committee assumed the attitude of a partisan defense of Mr. LORIMER. They condemned officials of the State of Illinois who prosecuted crimes in connection with this election and in effect suggested the subornation of perjury by such State officials. The committee evidently regarded the witnessess who testified, against their own interest, to having received bribes in this matter, as unworthy of belief, which, I think, was not justified, since a man who gives testimony against his own personal interest, who gives testimony that disgraces him before the community, who gives testimony that wounds the feelings of his family and friends, would not do so except by the compelling power of conscience which alone could drive him to make such a shameful confession.

The larger part of the report of the committee was devoted to an attempt to show that the State's attorneys had compelled witnesses to falsely confess bribery in order to escape the charge of perjury, a view which I could not approve and do not wish confirmed.

Ninth. I was not content with the doctrine laid down as the law of the case, that the election would only be invalid in case:

(1) That the person elected participated in one or more acts of bribery or attempted bribery or sanctioned or encouraged the same; or
(2) That by bribery or corrupt practices enough votes were obtained for him to change the result of the election.

I believe the time has come in this country to set a better precedent and adopt a higher moral and ethical standard. I believe that the Senate should set the precedent for all future time, that where a Senator's seat has been procured by the bribery of members of the legislature, such an election should be held void.

The English people were compelled to adopt this rule, and I put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in discussing the Lorimer case March 2, 1911, the English corrupt-practices act, with its plain, simple, common-sense rules, that has put an end to corrupt practices in Great Britain.

The Senate has the power to make the precedent for the election of its own Members. I want a sound rule and a rule that will terminate, not condone or encourage, bribery and corruption.

In my previous remarks I pointed out testimony, which I found convincing, of 10 men whose corrupt practices had been established by the evidence and 3 more to whom corrupt proposals had been made.

The committee paid no attention to the point-blank testimony of Henry A. Shephard that Mr. LORIMER made him a personal promise, in violation of the law of the State of Illinois (the law against bribery), which forbids the making of a promise in order to obtain a vote. No weight was paid to that testimony of Mr. Shephard that Mr. LORIMER made him a personal promise to use his power as a Senator, if elected, to prevent Mr. Richards, the postmaster of Jerseyville, Ill., or his assistant, Mr. Becker, from being appointed as postmaster of that city if Shephard would vote for Mr. LORIMER. Yet Shephard makes the flat proposition in his testimony that he got this promise from Mr. LORIMER in exchange for his vote, and that he would not have given his vote to Mr. LORIMER unless he had gotten the promise, and Mr. LORIMER did not contradict and no man denied this open charge of personal bribery made against Mr. LORIMER.

This was a plain violation of the law of bribery of the State of Illinois, and it stands uncontradicted. The committee ignored the fact in its report.

I submit, for reference to the committee, whoever the committee may be, three affidavits. I do not care to have them go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I submit for reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections copies of the affidavits of Joseph M. Goodbrake, J. A. Hutchinson, and George D. Steinhauer, to the effect that Joseph S. Clark had made the statement that Mr. LORIMER had promised him the privilege of naming the postmaster at Vandalia, Ill., in consideration for his (Clark's) vote. These affidavits were sent me by William P. Welker, State's attorney. I did not present these affidavits to the Senate for the reason that cross-examination had not been provided, but I think they should now be before any committee which examines into this matter. This is another charge of personal bribery by Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate with any discussion of this matter. I understand perfectly well that the time for discussion has ended. We are arguing now to determine the personnel of the new and special committee. I believe the country will disapprove of the Senate of the United States if the Senate of the United States puts the naming of this special committee in the hands of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, nine of whom voted for Mr. LORIMER; and I am not willing to take any part in doing that which I believe will result unfavorably, even temporarily, to the high standing of this body before the American people.

PUBLIC OPINION.

Mr. President, I have a profound respect for public opinion, the opinion of the body of the American people. We have the most intelligent Nation in the world. Our people read more, think more, are more active intellectually than any people on earth. They are advised every day—morning, noon, and night—by our splendid American press of what occurs in Congress and in the Senate. With all due respect to the Senate, I believe they know more than the Senate, and this may account for the retirement of so many of our distinguished colleagues on March 4 last and should admonish those who remain not to express too great contempt for the opinions of the people nor to forget that public opinion is the ruling sovereign in this country.

Public opinion made a tremendous inroad on the Senate in the last Congress. It retired 20 Senators last March. It will retire 20 more in 1913 if it be not appeased. The American people have been very patient and long-suffering, but the limit of their patience has been reached by the subservience of the United States Senate to the selfish commercial interests of this country and the indifference of the Senate to public opinion.

For the reasons which I have set forth I shall support the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin, and I do so in a spirit of friendly and cordial amity toward the committee which has heretofore passed upon this matter. I am not willing to believe that they were less sincere than I, and I am not willing to be denied my right and my duty to express my sentiments by any fear that I may not meet the approval of any Senator who thinks differently from me.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I feel myself free from any embarrassment in speaking upon this question since the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has modified his original resolution by striking out that portion of it which provided for the appointment of a special committee of which I was one.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has discussed this question, apparently, upon the theory that it was solely a question as to the personnel of the committee. In my estimation that is far from the truth. It is not so much a question as to who shall conduct this investigation as it is a question as to how it shall be conducted. It is important, vastly important, to the Senate and to the country that this investigation, when made, shall be made fully, fairly, and without prejudice, bias, or the appearance of indifference on the part of the investigators. The Senate desires it, the country demands it, and the Senator from Illinois, if he is worthy to occupy a seat in this body under any circumstances, should demand it in his own interest.

When the previous investigation took place I was a private citizen. I had no more interest in the outcome of the investigation than any other private citizen had in the welfare and honor of his country. I was greatly surprised, when the investigation commenced, to see that a committee of the Senate of the United States, charged with the duty of ascertaining the facts with reference to the use of corrupt means in electing one of its Members, should practically place itself in the hands of the attorney of a newspaper and allow that attorney to control the progress and course of the investigation that was to be made. Right at the beginning an admission was made by the attorney who was conducting the examination that prevented the presentation of the evidence that we are confronting to-day, namely, that the Senator himself had been a party to the corruption that resulted in his election. It was broadly stated by the attorney, who was acting in that matter at the time in the interest of the newspaper, that there was no evidence of the fact that the Senator himself had been a party to corruption or that he had any knowledge whatever on that subject.

There was another thing that created surprise in my mind, and that was the fact that the Senator whose seat was in controversy here was never at any time, either voluntarily or by action of the committee, brought before the committee for the purpose of stating his side of the controversy. It is impossible for me to conceive that any man charged with the offenses that were charged in this instance should hesitate for one moment to demand of a committee called upon to investigate a question of that kind, he be heard, and heard under oath. The very fact that he did not make that demand, the very fact that he did not voluntarily present himself before the committee, in order to justify himself with respect to it, is the strongest possible ground for suspicion that he was guilty of partaking in the corruption that took place or that was alleged to have taken place in the legislature. If the committee desired to reach the bottom of this transaction, how did it happen that during all of this investigation no effort was made to require the testimony of the Senator from Illinois upon a question of this kind, involving not only the honor of the Senate, but the honor of the Senator himself, who might have been expected to appear before the committee for the purpose of making his own defense?

It is not a question, Mr. President, as to the personnel of the Committee on Privileges and Elections or the standing of any member of that committee. No Senator here would contend for a moment that any member of that committee is not as well fitted on account of his ability, his integrity, and his conscientious desire to do his duty as any other committeeman who might be selected by the Senate, but they have committed themselves to a certain line of conduct in the investigation of this matter, so far as the gathering together of the evidence is concerned; they have committed themselves to one line, so far as the law of the case is concerned; and I imagine, Mr. President, that a large majority of the Members upon this floor are not satisfied either with the manner in which the testimony in that investigation was taken and the investigation made, or with the law as it was laid down and contended for by the committee.

Does the Senate desire that sort of investigation to be remade in this case? Was the Senate satisfied with the investigation as it was made in the first instance? If so, the country was not satisfied, as was very clearly demonstrated very soon after the final vote was taken. Is there any Member of the Senate who is to-day satisfied with the investigation that was made at that time? Is the Senator from Illinois satisfied that that investigation established his right to a seat in this body and verified and established his own honesty and honor in that transaction? Certainly not.

Now, the question is whether we are going to refer this investigation back to that same committee, with the line of conduct in the investigation and the law as they have laid it down, or is it better, in the interest of the Senate and in the interest of the country, that new men should be selected to make the investigation?

I may say it has been a matter of some surprise to me that the Committee on Privileges and Elections has not itself, under the circumstances, asked that another committee should be appointed. On the contrary, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the chairman of that committee, has made the statement on the floor of the Senate that some of the members of the committee—I do not know how many—gathered together and determined to introduce the resolution that has been offered here by the Senator from Vermont, revesting the power to make this investigation in the committee of which he is chairman. Do the Senators believe that an investigation made by that committee under all the circumstances will be accepted on the part of the people of the country as conclusive? I do not.

I am not making any objection to this reference on account of the personality of any single member of the committee. I am making it upon the broad ground that they have so conducted this investigation in the past, that they have so contended for the law with respect to it, that it will not be conducted as it should be—in the interest of the Senate and the country. And it is for that reason, and for that reason alone, that I stand here to-day opposing the reference of this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and supporting the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am going to support the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin, because I think that the committee in the former investigation did not make a thorough investigation. I think the committee instead of following up all of the trails that were opened leading to evidence avoided them. I had not read a hundred pages of the testimony before I was impressed that at least some members of that committee were trying to prevent a thorough inquiry instead of making one.

The chairman of the committee in his statement made on Monday last said:

> I noticed that when the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] submitted his resolution it was very similar to the one which I had presented, and I was very willing that mine should remain on the table and that the resolution of the Senator from Virginia should be adopted, as I hope it will be adopted this afternoon.

Continuing:

> In some respects it is broader than the resolution which I presented, and it was my desire and my purpose, if the investigation were committed to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to make it as broad and deep and searching and thorough as was possible.

It is to be regretted that such a desire did not take possession of the Committee on Privileges and Elections sooner. If the desire expressed by the chairman of the committee on Monday last had existed in the minds of members of the committee when the former investigation was in progress the Senate would not now be bothered with this question as to whether or not this case should be reopened, for in my judgment there is not a line of testimony or evidence that has been brought out by the committee of the Illinois Senate that was not available to the Committee on Privileges and Elections at the time the investigation was made, if it had looked for it. The reason that the Senate of the United States, in considering this case at the last session, did not have the evidence that has been presented by the Senator from Wisconsin during this debate is because the committee did not go after it. It could have been found by proper inquiry.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TAYLOR in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was not a member of the subcommittee that had this investigation in charge. I attended none of their meetings. I was confined to my home by illness at the time, wholly unable to be there.

But, as has been suggested here this morning, that investigation was conducted largely upon lines suggested, as I suppose, by the Chicago Tribune. The committee, I understand, has been criticized for permitting the attorney of that paper to conduct, on the one side or the other, the investigation. Regarding that I express no opinion whatever.

But the information that has been brought out recently by the investigation of the senate of the Illinois Legislature is information which, I understand, was not in the possession of anybody connected with that investigation at that time. If so, it certainly ought to have been brought forward. If it was in the possession of those who are spoken of as having prosecuted that case before the committee, it certainly ought to have been brought forward by them. Unless it appears—and I do not recall the fact that it does—that these matters were in some way called to the attention of the subcommittee which was then investigating the matter I hardly see the justice of the Senator's criticism. If it was within their knowledge, or if it appears that it was within the knowledge of anybody who was connected with that examination, I should quite agree with him that the investigation ought to have gone further.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not contend that the information which has been brought out by the committee of the senate of Illinois was in possession of any members of the subcommittee at the time that the investigation was in progress, but I do contend, first, that it was the business of the subcommittee to look for evidence and follow up every indication as to where it could find evidence, independent of what the Chicago Tribune's attorney might say or do; and that if it had exercised the diligence it should have, this evidence was available then just as much as it was available to the committee of the State senate of Illinois afterwards.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have no disposition at all to criticize the statement made by the Senator from Kansas, but I wish to inquire of him whether previous to the publication by one of the Chicago papers, made during the present season, that it was known that $100,000 was spent in this election, it was known to anyone connected either with the committee or the prosecution that such evidence existed?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I take it the Senator wants to be fair in this matter.

Mr. BRISTOW. I certainly do.

Mr. NELSON. As a matter of fact, all this new testimony that has been brought out by the committee came through Mr. Kohlsaat, the editor and publisher of one of the leading Chicago papers. He saw fit, after the former trial, after the case was over, to publish an article in his paper, stating that a fund of $100,000 had been raised. That information Mr. Kohlsaat gave to nobody, and when he was subpœnaed before the senate committee of the Illinois Legislature for the first time he declined to divulge the source of his information and refused to answer the questions until the man who had given him the information released him from the promise of secrecy, and in that way he gave the testimony.

Now, you can readily see, Mr. Kohlsaat was a newspaper man. He did not go and communicate to the committee or anybody else. The first communication he made was in a newspaper article in his own paper quite awhile after we had disposed of the case here in the Senate. As one of the Senators who voted against Mr. LORIMER in this matter, I trust it is safe for me to make this statement here in this body and to call the attention of Senators to the fact that all this subsequent testimony was brought out because of that editorial statement in Mr. Kohlsaat's paper. He might have come out before, but until he did how could the committee know that Mr. Kohlsaat was possessed of that information?

Probably he was actuated by this spirit. The investigation had been started by the Chicago Tribune, a rival newspaper. Probably he felt like this: Let the Tribune go on and see what it can do; and after the Tribune had failed, then Mr. Kohlsaat, as a newspaper man, came forward with his story, and that led to this new testimony that we have before us to-day, which was presented by the Senator from Wisconsin.

There is whence it came, and the committee is not to be blamed for not getting that testimony. If anybody is to blame for it it is Mr. Kohlsaat for not informing the committee when they were sitting in Chicago.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the Senator from Minnesota is in error in stating that the editorial was printed after the Senate had voted upon the Lorimer case.

Mr. NELSON. I think not. I am quite sure about it.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; it was printed before. It first appeared February 15, 1911.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me? Possibly before we had voted, but not until long after the committee had made their investigation in Chicago.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; it was printed after the committee had made the investigation in Chicago.

Mr. NELSON. And after they had made their report here.

Mr. BRISTOW. But before the Senate had voted upon the Lorimer case.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. One question further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. This question was very thoroughly discussed in the Senate. I will inquire of the Senator from Kansas whether this newly discovered evidence was in any way called to the attention of the Senate during the debate and before the action of the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. My memory may be in error; I would not state positively, but I think this editorial was made a subject of comment. At least I think it was reproduced in papers before the Lorimer case was disposed of by the Senate.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If it was, it escaped my attention entirely, and if there is a word in the record of the debate in the Senate that refers to any such thing, I would be glad to have it pointed out.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am confident that Members of the Senate had heard of Mr. Kohlsaat's views upon the matter, and that he had communicated with certain Members of the Senate and given them information in confidential communications bearing upon this subject.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Then, I would inquire of the Senator from Kansas whether the other Members of the Senate were dealt fairly with in that debate if this information prevailed or was ascertainable and that fact was not disclosed to us?

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, that would be a little difficult to say. Mr. Kohlsaat had talked in confidence to a number of friends in regard to this information; had communicated with a number of friends. Some of them were Members of the Senate, so I have been advised. I have no personal knowledge of this. And they did not feel justified in making public information which they had in confidence. Whether or not any members of the committee were advised as to Mr. Kohlsaat's views, I am not able to say.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to say that, so far, certainly, as I am concerned, this information first came to me during the present session and since the matter was made public in the State of Illinois; and I can only repeat that if the knowledge of these circumstances was known on the part of anyone in the Senate at the time, it seems to me it should then be urged as a reason why the case should be reopened.

I want to say again what I said the other day, and I say it in earnest, too, that if this case is reopened, it ought to be prosecuted with vigor and thoroughness and efficiency, so that every fact shall be known, whether it is done by one committee or another.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator from Vermont a question for information?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I have often wondered why Mr. Hines was not called as a witness before that committee. Has the Senator any information on that point?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not. As I have said before, I say again, I was not a member of the subcommittee that had this investigation in charge. I was not present in Chicago. In fact, I was confined to my home in Vermont with illness at the time and I was unable to get in touch with——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Iowa, who has referred to Mr. Hines, that Hines got into the case because of the information that Mr. Kohlsaat gave, or when he published an article in his paper stating in substance that a hundred thousand dollars corruption fund had been raised. But when he was called before the committee at first he refused to answer, because it was confidential.

The committee adjourned. In the meantime, the man who had given Mr. Kohlsaat the information released him from his promise, and then he came forward and brought Mr. Hines into the case. That is how Hines got into it. He did not get into it before Mr. Kohlsaat's article.

Mr. KENYON. My understanding was that Mr. Hines was very much in the case long before Mr. Kohlsaat's article.

Mr. NELSON. Not in reference to this matter.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. JONES. My recollection of the record is that there is nothing in it anywhere, from beginning to end, that suggests Mr. Hines.

Mr. NELSON. Nothing.

Mr. JONES. I may be mistaken; but I do not remember the name having been suggested, so far as the record goes, until after the case was voted upon.

Mr. BORAH. That is one complaint we have of the record, that there is nothing in it about Mr. Hines.

Mr. JONES. Nothing appeared anywhere to suggest to the committee that Mr. Hines was connected with it in any way, shape, or form. Of course, I would not excuse the committee if there was anything brought to their attention to indicate that Mr. Hines ought to be called. I would not excuse them at all; but there is nothing that I can see in the record to indicate that Mr. Hines was suggested as having anything to do with it.

I may say that, perhaps, things were brought before the committee upon which they should have acted in a great many ways, but I have not seen anything definite in the record to warrant any censure of the committee for not bringing Mr. Hines into the matter. I think, possibly, if I had been on the committee at the time I should have probably taken an entirely different view of several different propositions from the committee, but I do not believe the committee is subject to censure for not bringing Mr. Hines in during the progress of the testimony.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Kansas is a fair man; I have always found him to be so; and I am sure for the sake of truth he will bear with me.

How was this new testimony brought about? It came through the newspaper article of Mr. Kohlsaat, and after he was permitted to state what he knew, the information he divulged was that a certain person had told him that Mr. Hines had said there was a fund raised of $100,000 to elect Mr. LORIMER, and that Mr. Hines was going around trying to get money, and appealed to a certain gentleman—the man who had given the information to Mr. Kohlsaat—asking him to contribute $10,000 to reimburse them; that they were in such a hurry to raise that Lorimer fund of $100,000 a few of them had to put their hands into their own pockets, and then afterwards Mr. Hines was sent around to get contributions, and he passed the plate around to get more money to make up for those few who had put into the fund. Now, that is how Mr. Hines got into the case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the criticism that I have been making of the investigation was that the committee seemed to sit there and wait for something to come to it, and if it had not been for the interest of the Chicago Tribune in the matter I do not suppose that there would have been any investigation at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wonder if it would interrupt the Senator——

Mr. BRISTOW. Not at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. There seems to be much criticism of the action of the committee in this matter. Unfortunately, the chairman of the committee is no longer a member of this body. All Senators will recognize the functions of the chairman of a committee in presiding over the performance of the duty of a committee. I was only one member of that committee. We may all have had some idea as to how it should proceed, or we may have had different ideas, and the differences were not developed. I think Senators are losing sight of the jurisdiction of the committee as prescribed in the resolution. I think they are losing sight of the origin of the investigation; that they are losing sight of that which the committee was instructed by the Senate to do. The committee did not go out of its own accord with a dragnet in order to find charges against a Member of this body. It acted upon specific charges. It was instructed to investigate those charges and no others by the express language of the resolution, which I have before me.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am speaking only by the courtesy of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to ask——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not yield my interruption of the Senator from Kansas. I have no right to yield the floor to the Senator. I was proceeding to make a statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho declines to yield.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Kansas, I understand, yields to me to suggest——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator from Kansas takes me off my feet, then, of course, he can yield to whom he pleases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am speaking by the courtesy of the Senator from Kansas, in his time, and I did it because I have heard it charged here within the last few minutes that the committee should have done this and that, and we heard one Senator say if he had been a member of the committee he might have done so-and-so.

Now, it would be well enough for us to look to the power and duty that was given that committee. The resolution does not say that they shall go out and hunt up testimony or hunt up a new case on new grounds other than those contained in the charges. It says:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to examine the allegations recently made in the public press charging that——

No; that is Mr. LORIMER's resolution. I withdraw that from the record. I have the wrong paper. It was the resolution of Mr. LORIMER that I started to read, which was never acted upon. It remains to-day in the hands of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The resolution under which the committee acted was as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized and directed to investigate certain charges against WILLIAM LORIMER, a Senator from the State of Illinois, and to report to the Senate whether in the election of said WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from said State of Illinois there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices.

The charges alleged corrupt methods and practices.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, if the Senator will permit me, it seems to me that is all the authority any committee ought to want to make the most thorough and searching investigation possible.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, the charges——

Mr. BRISTOW. The charges were——

Mr. HEYBURN. They are in the RECORD.

Mr. BRISTOW. And also whether corrupt methods——

Mr. HEYBURN. They are in the RECORD.

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Senator please read the resolution again?

Mr. HEYBURN. The charges are specific. I will read the resolution:

That the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized and directed to investigate certain charges against WILLIAM LORIMER—

Now, there was only one set of charges made, and that was made by the resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the committee were directed to investigate the charges. What were the charges?

Mr. HEYBURN. "Certain charges."

Mr. BRISTOW. What further direction did the committee receive?

Mr. HEYBURN. Nothing that was entirely in line with the first allegation.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will continue to read it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will.

To investigate certain charges against WILLIAM LORIMER, a Senator from the State of Illinois, and to report to the Senate—

That is, upon the investigation of certain charges—to report to the Senate whether in the election of the said WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the said State of Illinois there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices.

Under said charges what would the Senator do in court, where the rules of procedure are specific and perfectly established, if he were directed to investigate certain charges? Would he feel that he had a roving commission to go out in the world and see whether or not he could find some charges or some grounds upon which to charge? We were not appointed to perform any such duty.

If Senators who are discussing this question will bear in mind that the committee was investigating specific and not general charges, that the charges were made by Clifford W. Barnes, that they are in this record, that the charges were presented by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] upon the authority of Clifford W. Barnes, they will keep closer to the text. The committee was not a roving committee. It was not sent out to find out something that was not charged. It performed its duty like good lawyers and Senators and not like brigands.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRISTOW. In just a moment. I desire to state that the phraseology of the resolution imposed upon that committee the broadest authority and directed it to ascertain whether or not WILLIAM LORIMER was elected by the use of corrupt methods.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, let us take the Senator's statement, Mr. President. How was the committee to gather information as to the grounds upon which any charges are based except through the ordinary medium, which was the charging party, with those associated with him? The committee was not appointed to go outside of the things charged. If the committee had had it brought to their attention, it would have been authorized and would have investigated any charges. Did the Senator know then of anything the committee should investigate?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Kansas had been a member of that committee, I think he would have made a more rigid effort to find information than the committee did.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator was a member of that committee, and I made a separate report joining in the general report——

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Kansas I was referring to. The question was directed to me.

Mr. HEYBURN. I beg pardon. The Senator from Kansas, then, means to say had he been a member of the committee he would have performed those duties better. Now, what information did he have upon which he could have based any further investigation? Did the Senator have any information?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Kansas would not have considered himself limited by the narrow construction which the Senator from Idaho seems to have given to the direction.

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, I repeat, did the Senator then or at any time have knowledge upon which he might have acted as a member of that committee had he been a member of it?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Kansas was not a member of that committee. He did not have the opportunity to investigate these facts, nor was the opportunity offered to him to ascertain whether or not there was additional evidence that would tend to prove that Mr. LORIMER was elected by corrupt methods.

Mr. HEYBURN. How would the Senator obtain that?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the committee had subpœnaed other witnesses.

Mr. HEYBURN. What witnesses?

Mr. BRISTOW. A number of them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Based upon what? What other witnesses? Name one witness the committee should have subpœnaed.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should have subpœnaed Mr. Hines.

Mr. HEYBURN. The committee did not even hear of Mr. Hines in connection with it. Upon what knowledge would the Senator have subpœnaed Mr. Hines?

Mr. BRISTOW. There the Senator explains the weakness of this committee's investigation. They have never heard of Mr. Hines. His connection with the Lorimer case was notorious, and if the committee had not heard of him—— [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Occupants of the galleries must refrain from any demonstration either of approval or disapproval. Any demonstration by the occupants of the galleries is not permitted under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Can the Senator refer to any word written, spoken, or printed that connected Mr. Hines with this matter at the time of the hearings? If so, where is it?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, well, the Senator can ask questions at random here. I do not remember.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is not much random about it.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is a matter of fact well known.

Mr. HEYBURN. Upon what is the fact based?

Mr. BRISTOW. That Mr. Hines was intimately connected with the election of Mr. LORIMER, and the evidence that has been brought out by the Illinois senate was then available if proper search had been made for it.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; but I want——

Mr. BRISTOW. It was available then if it had been sought for by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HEYBURN. Did the Senator know that Mr. Hines was charged as being connected with the Lorimer election?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator had been a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, he thinks he would have known more about it than the Senator from Idaho seems to know now.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator would have been wiser had he been a member of the committee than he was as a Senator of the United States?

Mr. BRISTOW. He would have undertaken to have informed himself upon all important matters relating to this case——

Mr. HEYBURN. What steps would the Senator have taken?

Mr. BRISTOW. Many which the Senator from Idaho seems to have neglected to have done.

Mr. HEYBURN. What steps would the Senator from Kansas have taken to inform himself?

Mr. BRISTOW. There are many steps that could have been taken.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know what steps the Senator would take to ascertain something on which he had no lead whatever.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should have subpœnaed a number of witnesses which the committee neglected to subpœna.

Mr. HEYBURN. What witnesses?

Mr. BRISTOW. I should have subpœnaed Mr. LORIMER for one.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. LORIMER was in attendance. He could not be compelled to testify. He was given an opportunity to testify.

Mr. BRISTOW. Did he decline to testify?

Mr. HEYBURN. He did not testify.

Mr. BRISTOW. Was he invited to testify?

Mr. HEYBURN. He was given an opportunity to testify.

Mr. BRISTOW. Was he asked to testify?

Mr. HEYBURN. He was asked.

Mr. BRISTOW. Did he refuse?

Mr. HEYBURN. He did not testify.

Mr. BRISTOW. Why did he not testify?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator supposes I might happen to have personal knowledge of the fact that he was asked.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Quote the record.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; you can not; that is all there is about that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas has the floor. Does he yield further?

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to do away with some of these bombastic fallacies that have been brought into this case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I submit that the Senator will do away with his own fallacies.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have nothing to do with yielding to the Senator from Wisconsin. I am here only by courtesy of the Senator from Kansas. I think it is high time that the discussion of this question should be brought down to the real facts, and not to those that have been conjured up from somewhere. Of course, everybody knows perhaps more now than before the Illinois Legislature investigated this matter. That is probably true, but I was speaking only from the standpoint of the duty of the committee, which it was charged they had not performed.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from Idaho is still a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as the question is whether this matter should be recommitted to that committee, it would certainly be interesting to know whether he still maintains the views he expressed formerly as to the narrow construction that should be placed upon the investigation by the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator from Kansas will yield to me, I will answer the Senator from California.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. When the newspapers published such statements as were published in regard to the investigation of this question by the senate of Illinois, I drew a resolution asking that this matter be reopened, and only did not present it to the Senate because others presented resolutions in the same hour and minute. Does the Senator from California think for a moment that, as a Member of this body, I have any prejudice in favor of Mr. LORIMER? My instincts are against Mr. LORIMER having a seat in this body, because I do not believe in any man holding a seat here with the aid of votes from an opposition party, and it required the strictest evidence, in my judgment, to compel me to arrive at a conclusion that he was entitled to his seat. I did not go into the hearings with any prejudice in his favor.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator from Kansas will indulge me——

Mr. BRISTOW. I beg pardon——

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from California made no such intimation. But certainly in the case of any Senator entertaining the sort of view as to the proposition contained in the resolution the Senator has expressed, the result would probably be as it was before.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator from California entertains such views as he has expressed here on other days it would seem to me that he is not an entirely unbiased judge in the case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, before this interesting and somewhat animated colloquy, I was suggesting that the objection I had to referring this investigation to the Committee on Privileges and Elections was that it was intrusted with this responsibility upon a former occasion, and it did not make a thorough investigation; that it did not follow out the clues that were available.

Mr. HEYBURN. Only once more. What charge did the committee not investigate that was embodied in the charges presented here to us?

Mr. BRISTOW. There was a long list of charges presented.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to see the list.

Mr. BRISTOW. There was a long list of charges by Mr. Barnes that was made the basis for an inquiry.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. Barnes refused to testify.

Mr. BRISTOW. And the committee was directed to ascertain whether or not Mr. LORIMER had been elected by corrupt methods.

Mr. HEYBURN. As charged, to investigate the charges for the purpose of seeing whether he was elected by corrupt methods.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will read the resolution——

Mr. HEYBURN. I read it.

Mr. BRISTOW. It does not say as charged. That was the interpolation by the Senator; it is not in the printed record. The committee was directed to ascertain whether or not Mr. LORIMER was elected by corrupt methods, and it did not follow up the clues with the energy and determination that it ought to have done.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was not a member of the subcommittee, but——

Mr. BRISTOW. There seems to have been only one member of the subcommittee, and that was the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. I should like to see another one if I can find him, for every member of the committee denies that he was a member of the subcommittee, and I think for very good reasons. I would be glad to hear the Senator——

Mr. FLETCHER. I will state what is true and correct; the record shows it. I am not making denials just for the sake of making them.

Mr. BRISTOW. I congratulate the Senator if the record does show that he was not a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I resent the idea that I am here to apologize for anybody at any time, either on the committee or on the subcommittee. It happens that there were seven members of the subcommittee. I believe five of them actually acted. The record shows who were present when this testimony was taken. Some of the members of that subcommittee are not now Members of the Senate. The chairman of the committee is not a Member of the Senate. That is all the more reason why I asked the courtesy of the Senator to allow me to interrupt him in order that there may be something approaching fairness in dealing with the subcommittee.

If I had been a member of the subcommittee, I should not presume to give attention to the remarks that are being made, or which have been made, but not being a member of the subcommittee, I feel that out of justice to those who are out of the Senate now, to say nothing of those who are in the Senate who are members of that committee or that subcommittee, that at least this much might be suggested to the Senator from Kansas.

He will recall the record shows that Mr. Austrian appeared before the subcommittee and stated:

> We have the names, we have the witnesses, we have the documentary proof and the evidence, and we, the Chicago Tribune, are thoroughly responsible. No one will gainsay that for a moment. We ask to appear in this matter.

And they were granted leave to do so.

Now, there was an agency at work, coming before the committee and assuring the committee that they had the witnesses and they knew the testimony—that they knew the facts and were ready and willing and anxious to produce them. Was it incumbent on the committee to go out searching the highways and byways at that time and under those conditions?

In addition to that, the people who now disclose this new alleged evidence were people who were identified with the prosecutors who appeared before that subcommittee. The editor of the Chicago Record-Herald, Mr. Funk, and other people there connected with the Harvester Co., and so forth, and the Chicago Tribune, as I understand it, were identified, certainly, with those who were opposing Mr. LORIMER. If they did not see fit to furnish the evidence in their breasts at that time to the subcommittee it seems to be far-reaching to blame the subcommittee for not presenting it to the full committee and subsequently to the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. I believe the Senator from Florida is at present a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am; and I was a member then.

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Senator from Florida favor the same limitation on the investigation that is going to be directed now to the committee that was imposed upon the committee formerly? Will the Senator refuse to listen to men who come and ask to be heard?

Mr. FLETCHER. Not at all; neither did that subcommittee.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator has just stated that it was not the business of the committee to go out to search for evidence.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not say it was not their business to go out and search for testimony if they had anything that made it worth while or pointed to any lead.

I should say they ought to follow every lead that indicated pay dirt anywhere and in any direction. I am not in favor of any limitation.

The Senator asked me the question whether I am in favor of a limitation in the minds of the subcommittee or the full committee. I do not know for certain to what he refers, but, as far as I am concerned, I am not in favor of any limitation on this investigation. Let it lead where it will; let it open up what it may; let it reach whom it may; follow it to the bottom and to the limit, that the truth may be known, and let the chips fall where they will.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will simply state again, as I said in the beginning, that if the Committee on Privileges and Elections at the former investigation had been animated by the spirit which, judging from what Senators say, at least two members are animated with now, these two weeks of discussion in regard to the opening of this case would have been unnecessary.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; and I submit now that we are wasting time in giving reasons why this case should have been reopened, when there was not a Member of this body opposed to it from the start.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, it is a question——

Mr. FLETCHER. But, if the Senator will allow me one moment, so much more is the reason for urging that the Senator is scarcely fair to the old committee, when the fact is that the members of the old committee were not insisting upon limitations or restrictions in the making of this investigation. The subcommittee ruled out certain testimony as they saw fit, but if there were any rulings objectionable of that nature, the criticism ought to be confined to the subcommittee and not to a general charge against a whole committee. I say frankly I can not conceive of any sort of limitations or any sort of restriction now that ought to be imposed upon the members making this investigation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I just wanted to ask, before the Senator from Florida took his seat, whether the Committee on Privileges and Elections did not adopt the limitation which the subcommittee had fixed with respect to testimony—that is, to make myself a little more specific, whether on that Saturday morning when the Committee on Privileges and Elections first met to receive the report of the subcommittee, whether they did not propose to adopt, and whether there was not a motion made to adopt, the report of the subcommittee just as it had been made to the full committee, limitations and all?

Mr. FLETCHER. My recollection is—I suppose I am authorized to say—that a motion was made to adopt the report of the subcommittee when it was submitted to the full committee, that the motion was not adopted or agreed to, and the report of the subcommittee was afterwards submitted to the members of the full committee, and not until they had had an opportunity of examining it and all the record did the full committee act upon the report of the subcommittee. That is my recollection of it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if I am not interfering with the course of the argument of the Senator from Kansas I remind Senators of the statement made on the floor of the Senate by a member of that committee, Senator Beveridge, that on Saturday morning, December 17, the Committee on Privileges and Elections was first called together to receive the report of the subcommittee.

Mr. President, I do not feel the same hesitation which some Members of the Senate express with respect to talking on the floor of the Senate about committee proceedings, because, sir, I believe that work done in committee is public business, and I do not recognize the right of any Senate committee to put the ban of secrecy upon the public business which a committee transacts.

Immediately thereafter, before any Senator had had an opportunity to examine that testimony, a motion was made that the report of the subcommittee which confirmed the title of WILLIAM LORIMER to a seat here, be adopted by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

So, I say, Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] is right in assuming that the full Committee on Privileges and Elections was not in possession of all the facts in this case when it adopted the report of the subcommittee in that meeting. As early as February 15—indeed much before that date—the Chicago papers—not the Tribune, but other Chicago papers—had published the fact of the existence of this hundred thousand dollar slush fund, brought together and contributed for the purpose of purchasing a seat on the floor of the United States Senate. It would seem to me, Mr. President, with those publications, so widely made by entirely responsible newspapers, that even if they had made their report to the Senate, having notice of the existence of testimony so vital, so important, the Committee on Privileges and Elections should have asked the Senate to be allowed to take further testimony in the case.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, my curiosity is excited by what the Senator from Wisconsin has just said. If I understand him aright, he declares that it was a matter of general information, perhaps, in the Senate that before the conclusion of the Lorimer case in the last Congress it was known that reputable newspapers published somewhere had charged that a fund of $100,000 had been raised to purchase a seat in the Senate. The chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections this morning declared in the hearing of the Senate that he had no such information; that he knew nothing of it; and that he had not heard of it until after the matter was taken up by the Illinois State senate. I am not sure that I ever heard of the matter until about that time—I mean the Kohlsaat matter. I would ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he knew of it before that time?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I answer very frankly, Mr. President, that I heard of it shortly after the publication of the editorial on the 15th of February. That is the date of the publication of one editorial in the Chicago Record-Herald, charging that a hundred thousand dollar fund had been expended in corrupting the Illinois Legislature and securing the election of LORIMER to the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Is that the editorial about which Mr. Kohlsaat was first examined by the Illinois senate?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not able to say whether or not that is the specific editorial that the Illinois State senate committee had in mind when it examined him. I know that editorial was published on the 15th of February, 1911, but I am informed that other——

Mr. STONE. What was the date of that?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The 15th of February.

Mr. STONE. What was the date of the final vote on the Lorimer case? I do not now recall.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The 1st of March.

I am informed that other editorials or editorial comment had been made with reference to the existence of such a fund prior to that time, but my attention was first directed to the publication of that editorial shortly after it appeared. I will say to the Senator from Missouri and to other Senators that it stimulated me to make some inquiry, and I sent a telegram to the editor of the Record-Herald asking him to furnish me the information upon which that editorial was based.

I followed it up, sir, with other telegrams. I was not able to elicit from him the information upon which he based the statement in that editorial. I suffered in that respect just exactly as the senate committee of the Illinois Legislature did when it got Mr. Kohlsaat before that committee and he refused to answer. He felt bound by an obligation of confidence to the party who had communicated that information to him not to disclose his authority—a sort of journalistic obligation.

I will say to the Senator from Missouri and to the Senate that I appealed to the editor of the Chicago Record-Herald to put me in possession of such facts as would enable me to lay before the Senate some specific data upon which to arrest the further consideration of the Lorimer case or to reopen it for further investigation.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. That was matter, Mr. President, in the possession of the Senator from Wisconsin, and he was pursuing a course that was exceedingly praiseworthy in endeavoring to ascertain the facts from Mr. Kohlsaat or from anyone else having the information; but that is a little foreign to the point I have in mind. What I wanted to know was whether the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator brought that information to the Senate itself or to the committee of the Senate itself, so that we might have taken cognizance of it here in the Senate, stopped the proceedings, and directed the committee to go further with the examination if necessary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I answer with the utmost frankness. I have lying upon my desk now a statement which I had drafted, addressed to the Senate, asking that further proceedings in the Lorimer case be stayed until the Senate could take further testimony regarding this hundred thousand dollar fund. But, Mr. President, I did not submit that statement to the Senate for the reason I will state. I made diligent effort to secure the information which would support the statement, but was unable to procure it. I stop now just a moment to remind the Senate that when a request was made in the Senate—I am not able to fix the date—but when a request was made for unanimous consent to fix a date for a vote on the Lorimer case I objected, and stated to the Senate at the time that I objected upon "good and sufficient reason." I was at that time in pursuit of this information and hopeful that I might be able to present it to the Senate before the final vote upon the case.

Mr. STONE. Did the Senator finally lay it before the Senate?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not; because I was informed that Mr. Kohlsaat would under no circumstances furnish that testimony, even if he were called before a committee of the Senate; and furthermore, that he would not appear before a committee of the Senate, and that he was ready to absent himself from the country and from the jurisdiction of a committee of the Senate if an effort should be made to summon him. So I was certain, Mr. President, if I succeeded in arresting proceedings in the Lorimer case, upon a statement that new testimony material to the issue existed, that I should be unable to produce the witness to prove the facts.

I believed and I stated to several Members of the Senate that, even though the Senate might vote to confirm the title of WILLIAM LORIMER to his seat in the Senate, ultimately the truth would be known; that it would not be possible to suppress the facts, and that ultimately the case would be reopened. I believed then that there would transpire just what has come to pass—that the Senate would be called upon to reconsider this case, and that the public interest would not greatly suffer by the delay. I want to assure the Senate that I used all legitimate means at my command to persuade Mr. Kohlsaat to come before the Senate committee and state the facts which he has since stated before the committee of the Illinois senate. I did everything in that respect which I could, but I failed, and was advised by those to whom I appealed at that time that if the statement were made here that this testimony was in existence I would find myself utterly unable to furnish it if the case should be stayed and reopened. For that reason, Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield, sir.

Mr. NELSON. I voted with the Senator on this question at the last session of Congress, and I concede the Senator was diligent, but in view of the fact that the Senator, although he was diligent, was unable to get this information, why should he charge the committee with a lack of diligence because they could not do better than he could?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, the committee had the authority of the Senate to subpœna witnesses. If they had gotten service upon Mr. Kohlsaat he would have been compelled to appear and finally to testify as he finally testified before the committee of the Illinois senate. As I have already stated, I was advised, if I asked to have the case referred back to the committee and the committee authorized to summon Mr. Kohlsaat, that he would have notice and ample time to place himself beyond the reach of subpœna before service could be made. I think this committee should have discovered these facts while they were investigating the case in Chicago. For more than a year, as I am informed, the story had been rife in Chicago that a hundred thousand dollars had been raised as a slush fund to put WILLIAM LORIMER "across" and elect him as a Member of the Senate.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator just for information——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a moment. Mr. President, I have been pretty careful in what I have said in this debate regarding the members of the former committee. I have not uttered a word reflecting upon their motives. I have tried, Mr. President, to observe the courtesies of debate. But I can not help saying now, in view of the suggestion of the Senator who has asked the question, that it does seem to me that a committee, clothed with the broad powers of this committee and given the direction that this committee was given by the Senate, might well have ascertained all the facts that have been testified to before the senate committee of the Illinois Legislature.

Without criticizing the rules of evidence adopted by the committee, which narrowed the scope of their inquiry, I am wholly unable to understand why they permitted Mr. Austrian, an attorney, who appeared for the Chicago Tribune, to fix the limit of their investigation, and why they did not themselves run down every suggestion of fact and send out everywhere for information bearing upon the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate. Had they pursued such a course can anyone doubt that they would have discovered as much and more than was discovered by the Illinois senate committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will interrupt the Senator, if I may, just for a moment in order that the record may be correct as regards the report of the subcommittee.

Mr. BRISTOW. Do I understand the Senator from Florida is asking me a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida is addressing his inquiry to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin just for a moment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg pardon of the Senator from Kansas for taking so much of his time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not know that the Senator from Kansas had the floor, but I will take only a moment. It will be borne in mind that testimony was taken by the subcommittee largely in September. The last testimony was taken on December 7. The report of the subcommittee to the full committee was made December 17. The action on that report by the full committee was taken December 20, and the report of the committee to the Senate was presented December 21. I simply want to state that as the chronological order of events.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Right in that connection——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. May I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Right in that connection, if the Senator from Kansas will yield to me that I may ask the Senator from Florida another question——

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I inquire of the Senator from Florida if it is not a fact that on the morning of Saturday, December 17, the testimony taken by the subcommittee was for the first time reported to the full committee and laid before them for consideration?

Mr. FLETCHER. My recollection is, Mr. President, that that is correct. Possibly some portions of the testimony and certainly the briefs of counsel had been furnished before that time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. May I interrupt the Senator to ask whether prior to that time any portion of the testimony had been furnished except what was quoted in the briefs of counsel?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not remember that there were any portions of the testimony actually furnished to the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No. I think that is true. Is it not also a fact, if I may still further ask the Senator for information, that on Saturday morning, December 17, assuming that to be the date when the testimony taken by the subcommittee was first submitted to the full committee—if a motion were not made to adopt the report of the subcommittee based upon that testimony, which, of course, no member of the committee, other than the seven members of the subcommittee, could have read up to that time?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am inclined to think that is correct. As I stated a moment ago, the motion was not agreed to. Action was not taken until the 20th.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a moment before I yield; I wish to ask the Senator from Florida another question. I ask the Senator from Florida this question, and I base it entirely upon the statements made in the course of debate by the then Senator from Indiana [Mr. Beveridge] who was a member of the committee: Is it not true that the reason why the report of the subcommittee was not adopted by the full committee at that Saturday morning session was because the then Senator from Indiana objected to the question being put to the committee on the ground that he had had no opportunity to look at the testimony, because it had just then been printed and laid before the full committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. I would say, in answer to that, Mr. President, that it is true, I believe, that the then Senator from Indiana did object to action on the motion at that time upon the ground that he had not had time or occasion to examine that testimony; but I can not say that was the sole reason the action was not taken, because there would have been others who would have objected to the consideration of the question at that time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On the same ground?

Mr. FLETCHER. On the same ground.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply want to remind the Senator from Wisconsin that the full committee were anxious to make their report to the Senate at the earliest possible day, because there was at that time in the Senate a complaint about the delay, and the full committee felt that it ought to submit its report, together with the printed testimony, so that Senators might have it during the holiday adjournment of Congress. That was one of the reasons urged for immediate action.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, of course, Mr. President, I assume that that was urged in the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not being a member of the committee I did not know that, and I do not recall that there had been any inquiry made on the floor of the Senate about the report of the committee that had been appointed to investigate the Lorimer case up to that time; but, of course, the Senator from Texas being a member of that committee will have better recollection upon that subject than I have.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I do not say that there had been any complaint made on the floor, because I do not recall that such was the case; but I do know that a number of Senators were urging the committee, as I think every member of the committee will recall, that the matter should be submitted at the earliest possible moment. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] reminds me that I myself suggested that it had better be done thoroughly than to be done in haste, and it was on my motion that the matter went over until every member of the committee was willing to say that he had sufficiently examined the record.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, upon that point, not being a member of the committee, I can not offer any statement; but I think it proper that I should call the attention of the Senate to the statement made by the then Senator from Indiana, Mr. Beveridge, who, in the course of his thorough and exhaustive discussion of this case, referred to this fact. I have the RECORD before me; but without referring to it and stating it just from having recently read it, I will say that the Senator from Indiana, Mr. Beveridge, asserted, in the course of the debate when the Lorimer case was before the Senate that the consideration of the case before the Committee on Privileges and Elections went over upon his insistence that he had not had any opportunity to examine the testimony upon which the subcommittee based its report, and hence could not vote either to approve or reject the report of the subcommittee, and he asked, as he states in his argument before the Senate, that the matter be permitted to go over until after the holidays in order that he might examine the testimony.

I remember very distinctly that he said there were seven hundred and odd pages of this testimony—I think about 780 pages of testimony—and he said he could not examine that testimony, and did not examine the testimony so as to vote intelligently as to whether he ought to support the report of the subcommittee or vote against it in the time that intervened between that Saturday morning and the Tuesday morning when the committee next met to vote on the adoption of the report made by the subcommittee.

If I can understand at all the statement of the Senator from Indiana, Mr. Beveridge, it was intended to make plain to the Senate that he had tried diligently between Saturday morning, when this testimony was submitted, and Tuesday morning, when the committee met, to vote on the question whether or not they would adopt the report of the subcommittee—and at which time they did adopt the report—that he had tried diligently to examine that testimony, to say nothing about the briefs of counsel upon either side, amounting to a couple of hundred pages, and that he had not found time between the dates of the meeting of the committee on Saturday morning and the reconvening of the committee on Tuesday morning to go over more than about 190 pages of the testimony and examine it with care and thoroughness such as a lawyer would want to put upon any record upon which he was to pass judgment.

I gathered from hearing the Senator from Indiana and from rereading his speech that he was compelled as a member of that committee to vote on Tuesday morning on the report of the subcommittee without having had an opportunity to read the testimony in this case and know the facts.

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator from Wisconsin permit me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not recall the statement of the former Senator with respect to the testimony. I do recall, however, that he made some statement on the floor as to his inability to examine the briefs, and I recall very distinctly that I suggested to him that the brief for the petitioner had been sent to the members of the committee some two months before the Congress convened. I know the Senator from Indiana did make some suggestion about the briefs.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Texas is right about that. I have just read over the discussion of that day, and the Senator from Texas did remind the Senator from Indiana of the fact that these briefs had been furnished somewhat in advance of the time when the printed record of testimony was furnished.

I beg the pardon of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] for having so long trespassed upon his time. I will recur to this subject a little later, and I yield the floor now, with my apologies for having occupied it so long.

Mr. BRISTOW. The question for which I yielded has been rather long, but I think I can remember about what I was saying.

To summarize, I stated that I was in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin, because I did not believe that the former investigation was thorough, that it was not made with that diligence with which it should have been made, and that I believed from what I have heard from the present members of that committee that it now entertains the same views as to the limitations imposed that the committee entertained at that time that the investigation was made. And that has been confirmed by statements made by the Senator from Florida, and the Senator from Idaho. That being the case it seems to me that the Committee on Privileges and Elections should not be intrusted with this investigation unless the Senate wants just such an investigation as was formerly made.

Now, I have received another impression, and that is, that while formerly the members of the committee did not go out and search for evidence as they should, did not secure evidence that was available if they had undertaken to have secured it, it now seems to be animated by a zeal and an earnestness, in part at least, that is creditable.

But I have been advised upon rumor, which has the earmarks of accuracy, that the committee as a whole does not intend to make this investigation, but intends to appoint, by the permission of the Senate, a subcommittee. I am not very familiar with senatorial procedure, but if it is the purpose to appoint a subcommittee, why does not the resolution say so, instead of saying that the committee shall sit in banc?

I have been further advised by rumor, which has the same earmarks of accuracy, that an agreement has been entered into by the Democratic leaders and by the Republican leaders that that committee shall consist of eight—four Democrats and four Republicans. Now, why the Republican leaders have abdicated the rights of the majority to have a majority on the committee on investigation I have not been advised.

Of course the leaders on the Republican side—I say "leaders" because they have no leader now. Since Mr. Aldrich retired his mantle has not been assumed by any of the Members on this side of the Chamber. But it is said in the public prints that an agreement was necessary in order to insure a majority vote in behalf of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, on this side, being unable to muster under his standard a majority of the Senate, has capitulated and withdrawn his resolution and accepted that of the leader on the Democratic side. And the leadership of the Democratic leader [Mr. MARTIN] is well recognized—or, at least, it was on Monday—because we could not adjourn until he made the motion.

It is with some feelings of regret, of course, that we see the mantle of Mr. Aldrich transferred from this side of the Chamber to the other, but it seemed to be necessary in this case.

I am advised that the Martin resolution is to pass, and that then the Committee on Privileges and Elections will select a subcommittee of eight—four Republicans and four Democrats—four Lorimer men and four anti-Lorimer men—and ask the Senate to confirm such a subcommittee, and that it will be confirmed by the same majority that has been secured by merging the two elements, one on this side of the Chamber and the other on that side, and that it will go through by practically the same vote that the Martin resolution will receive.

Now, that may be true. It looks like it was. Time will demonstrate whether or not it is.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do, for a question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas if that indicates to his mind that the reactionary elements in the Senate of both political parties are getting together?

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, I do not know, but I have been thinking. Now, that combination will put through the Martin resolution for a Lorimer investigation, giving to the committee that made the other investigation authority to proceed and investigate. It is to be hoped it will do a better job this time than it did the other.

I have wondered if this new combination and this new leadership are to continue during the session. It will control the Lorimer investigation. Will it control anything else—the tariff, for instance? Will this committee, when it is organized to make this investigation, investigate exclusively Mr. LORIMER or will it feel that it has authority to go out and find who contributed the money to buy this seat in the Senate and search for legal authority to bring action against the men who furnished the funds to bribe legislators and buy seats in this body, or will it hamper itself by that sense of propriety and restriction that will render safe Mr. Hines and the men from whom he collects $10,000 contributions? Will it in the hearing of the tariff bills that are to come protect Mr. Hines's duty on lumber which he has been so anxious to preserve and keep it in the tariff bill? Will it affect the duty on iron ore and a few other things? This is a very interesting inquiry that comes to my mind.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the question is—and the Senator from Kansas misses it—Will it prevent reciprocity?

Mr. BRISTOW. Will it insure reciprocity? That would be a better question for the Senator from Minnesota to put.

Now, it may be improper for me to make such inquiries; I may be infringing upon the dignity of this body. It may be somewhat embarrassing to the leaders on this side of the Chamber. The mantle of leadership has not yet found any single Senator to wear it. It seems the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has not been able to get the mantle onto his shoulders. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has not found that it fits him exactly, although he has inherited it by official position. And for some strange reason—I do not know why—it has not been tendered to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

But since the wolves have somewhat scattered the flock of lambs on this side of the Chamber, and they have recently been in great need of a shepherd, I congratulate them upon having found one, Mr. MARTIN, on the Democratic side. And now we are assured that the majority is safe and an official adjourner will be selected soon, so that when the Senate is ready to adjourn we will receive the signal from authority.

Mr. President, I think that the Senate owes something to itself as well as to the public. Senators may assume to despise public opinion and hold it in contempt, and they may discredit the intelligence of the American reading public; that is, they may attempt to do so; but that will not succeed.

If there is anything that the Senate needs, it is to be restored to the high public esteem that it once occupied and which it ought to occupy now. Senators, public opinion is the sovereign power of this country. We have no other sovereign, and it is entitled to the respect that sovereignty is entitled to, and the man or set of men that affect to despise it will in time receive that public condemnation and disapproval that they deserve.

I want a new committee to make this investigation because the results of the last investigation have destroyed public confidence in the thoroughness and effectiveness of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The welfare of this country depends vitally upon the public confidence that the executive and legislative and judicial branches of the Government hold, and if any one branch of this Government of ours loses that public confidence, the very stability and foundations of the Government are weakened.

It is a painful thing for me to sit here and hear Senators intimate that we should be proof against the influence of public opinion. This body is being tried by public opinion in this country to-day, and that public opinion carries tremendous weight, and it should. We ought to do that which will most readily and effectively inspire the public confidence, and that will be to appoint a new committee to make this investigation, to do it promptly, and then act with equal promptness upon the facts which the committee submits to us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] for the resolution submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, I had not intended participating in the debate upon this question, but feel impelled to state briefly my position, giving the reasons for the vote which I intend to record.

In the beginning, it is necessary to state that from such testimony as has been published in the papers relating to the Lorimer investigation by a committee of this Senate, the reports of the committee and the minority report, the newspaper reports of the criminal proceedings in Illinois growing out of the legislative session of 1909, and from the fact that Senator LORIMER did not take the stand in his own behalf during the Senate investigation, I have formed an impression—or opinion, if you like—that the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States was not valid. While it is an impression or opinion, it is one which could be removed by testimony; still I want the Senators to know that, although not a Member of the Sixty-first Congress which passed upon this case, in company with Senators who recorded their votes at that time, I have an opinion upon it.

Next, Mr. President, I shall state that my every personal inclination is to support the substitute resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], because I would like, especially since he was not my choice for minority leader, to express the full and absolute confidence I feel in his integrity of purpose in his sincere desire that the election of WILLIAM LORIMER be given the fullest and most complete investigation. Not only that, but, since he has introduced the substitute resolution, I would be inclined to vote for it as an expression of my appreciation of his consideration and tactful attitude toward the minority Senators of this body and as a public acknowledgment of his splendid leadership.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], in the course of his remarks upon this resolution, on Friday of last week, said: "In my judgment, with some immaterial exceptions, that committee (referring to the Committee on Privileges and Elections) did its work as well as any committee of the Senate could have done, and it is no fair subject of criticism against it that some of the witnesses to those transactions concealed their knowledge from that committee and afterwards imparted it to another committee or to the people."

If the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] casts his vote for the substitute resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia instead of for the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], as an expression of his approval of the course taken by the last committee of the Senate, by his reasonings I must withhold my vote, for I can not approve of the course of investigation pursued by that committee or of the conclusions it reached.

And in saying this, I want it to be understood frankly that I do not in the slightest degree impugn the motives of any of the Senators who acted upon that committee, for I have the fullest confidence in their integrity of purpose, and in what I believe to have been their sincere desire to conduct a thorough investigation, and acknowledge gladly their high character and splendid abilities. My difference with them is not a personal one, but entirely one of judgment.

There are at least four grounds on which I do not approve the course of the former committee, and in stating these I shall not go into the reasonings by which the full committee reached its conclusions, but deal entirely with the procedure adopted by the subcommittee.

The first ground of disapproval relates to the committee's conception of its functions. The committee seems to have thought that its functions were purely judicial and that it occupied the position of a referee or master in chancery to sit and hear proof which might be offered in the controversy, and to report its findings to the full committee or to the Senate; that the parties to this controversy were Mr. Clifford W. Barnes, representing the Legislative Voters' League of Illinois, and his designated successor, the Chicago Tribune, on the one hand, and Senator LORIMER as represented by his counsel, upon the other, and that it could make no investigation other than that demanded by these parties.

A more correct idea of the functions of that committee would have been that the Senators, while sitting as such a committee, have not only judicial but inquisitorial functions to perform, and if any parallel is to be drawn, this committee of the Senate is to be likened not to a referee or master in chancery, but rather to a grand jury; that it is to hear not only the testimony that may be offered by the parties directly interested in the controversy, but to seek out, ascertain, and introduce any testimony that may shed light upon the methods employed to secure the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

That the committee assumed the theory of the case attributed to it by me is substantiated by the following quotation from page 2 of their report:

> At what was practically the outset of the investigation counsel for the Chicago Tribune (who conducted the inquiry against Senator LORIMER) announced that he did not expect to connect Senator LORIMER with any acts of bribery, and upon this point the following took place.

There follows after this statement a quotation from the transcript of the case, showing the position of the Chicago Tribune, and throughout the case, so far as I have been able to observe, the committee pursued this attitude, namely: That, inasmuch as counsel for the Chicago Tribune did not claim that Senator LORIMER was connected with any acts of bribery, therefore no investigation should be made upon this point.

Upon the other theory of the case, investigation should have been made to see whether Senator LORIMER was connected with the bribery in this case, irrespective of the attitude of counsel for the Chiacgo Tribune or anyone else.

It should have been an investigation, not by the Chicago Tribune, not by the Illinois Voters' League, but by the Senate of the United States, an investigation by the Senate to find out whether a man had bought his way, or his way had been bought for him, into this great body, and it should not have stopped at any barriers that might have been raised by any counsel for interested parties.

This brings us to the second ground of my disapproval of the procedure of the committee in this investigation, and that is, the failure to put Senator LORIMER upon the stand and require him to give testimony. The fact, as I gather to-day, that a majority of the Senate believe that if another inquiry is instituted one of the first things that should be done by the committee in charge of it would be to place Senator LORIMER upon the stand, is sufficient ground for stating that the former committee erred in not putting WILLIAM LORIMER upon the stand.

The third ground of disapproval of the course pursued by that committee was the adoption by it of certain rules of evidence, by which, as I conceive, certain important testimony was excluded, testimony which would have led to the discovery, doubtless, of other evidence that would have been pertinent and material, and which would doubtless have rendered unnecessary another investigation of this case.

One instance of this is shown by the following quotation from the RECORD, page 395, during the examination of W. F. Gray, after Mr. Gray had testified that he introduced at the Commercial Trust Co., and where he made a deposit of $500, one H. J. C. Beckemeyer, a member of the Legislature of Illinois, who had voted for Senator LORIMER.

Q. What were the denominations of the bills you saw?—A. A $100 bill.
Q. Did you ask where he got it?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did he say?
Judge HANECY. I object to that. That is the same question that has been ruled on several times. He can not make corroborative or self-supporting testimony for himself.
Mr. AUSTRIAN. He said he deposited it at the Commercial Trust Bank, and this gentleman took him there and introduced him. That is a part of the res gestæ.
Judge HANECY. It is a collateral matter; there is no res gestæ on a collateral thing. The doctrine of res gestæ applies to the thing itself. This is offered for the purpose of inducing this honorable committee or somebody else to infer or draw a deduction or inference against the presumption of innocence; the direct inference that he got this money by improper methods and in an improper manner, not from the same general, but from other, sources that it is claimed here it was paid. I submit the matter can not be proven in that way by proving a lot of collateral things and leave it for somebody to infer.
Senator GAMBLE. Is this for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of Mr. Beckemeyer?
Mr. AUSTRIAN. No, sir.
Judge HANECY. Or of supporting it?
Mr. AUSTRIAN. Of course it is for the purpose of supporting it.
Senator PAYNTER. When did this occur?
The WITNESS. Somewhere last July or the 1st of August. I paid no attention to it. He came in and asked me to go over, and I went over.
Senator BURROWS. The objection will be sustained.

It also appears that other gentlemen—Mr. Ford and Mr. Murray—would have testified similarly to Mr. Gray, but under the ruling of the committee they were not offered as witnesses. The point I desire to make in this connection is that if Mr. Gray had been allowed to answer the question and had stated that he received that money (deposited at the Commercial Trust Co.) because he had voted for Senator LORIMER, then not only under the theory of Mr. Austrian would that testimony have been competent, but it would have been competent as a declaration against interest and would have been material in this case.

I could cite other similar instances, including the testimony of the wife of the late Representative Luke, in regard to the statement he made on his return from St. Louis, where he had been called to meet Leader O'Neil Brown, when he showed her $950 in bills of large denominations. That testimony was excluded on the same ground.

Mr. President, my insistence is that the committee, by establishing such highly technical rules of evidence, even though they were correct, which I do not concede, narrowed the scope of this inquiry, and that if the scope had been as broad as it should have been, doubtless to-day the time of the Senate and whatever committee may be appointed to make this investigation would not have to be spent in making another investigation, for Mr. LORIMER would either have been rightly exonerated or he would have been denied his seat in this body, and that would have ended the subject, once and for all.

Mr. President, my fourth disagreement with the committee is that the committee did not call Edward W. Hines to the stand and take his testimony as to what he knew about the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, for I believe we will all agree to-day that Hines could have shed more light upon this subject than any other man. Mr. Hines, Mr. President, was not an unknown man in this controversy at the time the subcommittee convened and sat in Chicago. He had been known for some time as one of the creators, or alleged creators, of Senator LORIMER. In the Chicago Tribune of May 4, 1910—many months before the subcommittee sat in Chicago—there was an article published showing the connection between Senator LORIMER and Mr. Hines. We find such articles published frequently. In the Chicago Tribune of May 6 we find the following quotation from an article that was published on this subject:

Mr. Hines admits he telegraphed Aldrich for an appointment, but says that he talked to the Senator about the lumber duty, and not about LORIMER for Senator. Yet apparently there was the silent understanding between the two that is common to great minds. For along toward the latter part of May Senator Aldrich confided this to a friend:

"Mr. LORIMER probably will be the new Senator from Illinois. Mr. Hines has gone out there to see what can be done."

It was even as the astute Senator said. Mr. Hines had departed from Washington the day before, bound for Illinois. A few days later the election of Mr. LORIMER was accomplished. Thus it came about that Mr. Hines was given the principal credit for resolving order out of the legislative chaos and filling the vacant seat in the Senate.

In this way Senator Aldrich saw his wish for a new Senator—anybody but Hopkins—come true. A few weeks later Mr. Hines realized a large part of his wish, for the Senate raised the duty on lumber to $1.50.

Again, we find similar articles in the Tribune of May 27 and August 5. Then we find that by September public opinion had grown so in regard to the connection of this man Hines with this controversy, and had become so settled and fixed that Hines was a party to whatever was illegitimate in that election, that a great conservation congress held at St. Paul considered that Hines would not be a fit man to preside as chairman of the committee on credentials, and why? Because of his notorious connection with the Lorimer case. Hines's connection with LORIMER was notorious enough for the conservation congress to deny him the honor of the chairmanship of the committee on credentials, but it was not notorious enough for the subcommittee at Chicago to send for him and to ask him what he knew about the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, the election of a man whom, as I understand it, he had boasted throughout the clubs of Chicago he had elected and raised to the exalted position which he was then filling.

We have the testimony in regard to what happened at St. Paul from a very distinguished gentleman who to-day occupies a seat in the President's Cabinet. In referring to the naming of Mr. Hines then as chairman of the committee on credentials, Mr. Fisher, now Secretary of the Interior, said:

The vote of 28 to 5 in the Illinois delegation [said Mr. Fisher] indicated that the opposition to Mr. Hines as chairman of the committee on credentials was nearly unanimous.

Then, referring to the part he took in the discussion, Mr. Fisher said:

But on account of Mr. Hines's prominence in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, including his activities at Springfield, I argued that it was inopportune that he should hold a prominent place in the Congress as an Illinoisan.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LEA. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I ask the Senator the date of that last quotation which the Senator has read?

Mr. LEA. This was from the Chicago Tribune of Thursday, September 8. As I recall it, it was about two weeks before the Senate subcommittee on investigation met in Chicago.

Mr. President, as I was saying, if this subcommittee had had a different view of its functions, if it had resolved then to act, not in a purely judicial, but in an inquisitorial capacity, I submit that with these statements about Hines being published in at least one paper—and doubtless published in many others, for I have not had time to examine the files carefully—this committee would have called Mr. Hines to the stand and made him testify as to his connection with the election of WILLIAM LORIMER. The committee did not take that view of its functions, and for that reason, Mr. President, I am unwilling by my vote to return this case to that committee, not knowing whether it will consider that it is necessary for it to place the same limitations upon their investigation.

Mr. President, I would not have the temerity to suggest my disagreements with the procedure of this committee unless the fact had subsequently developed that the committee was in error, for, Mr. President and Senators, whenever we cast a vote to reopen this case, disguise it and sugar coat it as we may, it records the solemn conclusion that the investigation by the former committee was not a success, but a failure. If it had been a success—whether it exonerated LORIMER or unseated him—we would not be consuming time to-day in deciding whether we should make another investigation and who shall conduct it.

Mr. HEYBURN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LEA. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Did the Senator see that statement in the newspaper before or during the sitting of the subcommittee in Chicago?

Mr. LEA. I did not. I will say to the Senator from Idaho I was not then investigating this question as a Senator. I was not even a Member of Congress much less a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Speaking as one of the subcommittee, I will say that I never saw it. There might have been a thousand statements in newspapers that no member of the committee would see at all. I never heard of it.

Mr. LEA. I am very glad the Senator asked me that question, because had he been investigating this subject with a view of the committee's having inquisitorial powers, he would have been searching any new channel of investigation that might be opened.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I may speak for every member of the committee, that had their attention been called to it—and none will assume that they must know all that is in the newspapers—they certainly would have taken notice of it, and it is no reflection upon them that they did not know all that was in all the papers of the United States.

Mr. LEA. As I have distinctly stated, nothing that I am saying is to be construed as a reflection on the committee. It shows a certain line of procedure. That line of procedure did not result in success, and if the Senate votes to refer the case to it again it indorses a line of procedure which resulted in failure, for the committee did not accomplish the purpose for which it was created.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to suggest in this connection, if it does not bother the Senator, that it is rather singular, in the light of what has transpired, that the Chicago Tribune, which certainly exhausted every possible avenue for evidence or suggestions against Mr. LORIMER, did not call the attention of the committee to it. The committee did not reside in Chicago, and I doubt if any of them read that paper. There can be no question as to the zeal with which the Chicago Tribune was pursuing this prosecution.

Mr. LEA. Relying as much as the subcommittee and the Senator evidently did on the Chicago Tribune, it is fair to assume that at that time at least the Chicago Tribune chose one way of calling it to the attention of the committee, and that was by publishing in its columns under very broad and flaring headlines——

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not read the Chicago Tribune. I do not know whether other members of the committee read it, but I did not read in it a statement that it made in regard to Mr. LORIMER. They produced before us much that they had said.

Mr. LEA. In the light of recent events I will say to the Senator from Idaho, I think it is unfortunate he was not at that time a reader of the Chicago Tribune.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I was fortunate.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he knows that when the committee commenced its investigation they first called before them the official of the Voters' League and asked him to present all the witnesses they could produce touching this election? The official said he had no personal knowledge of it—that he got all his information from the Chicago Tribune—and asked that they should be substituted for him in representing the side which was against the election of Mr. LORIMER, and the committee afterwards admitted Mr. Austrian, the attorney of the Chicago Tribune, who proceeded to call witnesses, and every witness he called was examined by the committee, as I remember it. If he, knowing that Hines or any other man was implicated, and that his principal the Chicago Tribune had so stated, knowingly failed to give this information or to call this witness, I would say that he acted in bad faith to the committee and his employer.

Mr. LEA. I am very grateful to the Senator for interrupting me, because evidently I did not make myself clear to him. I stated that I can not vote for this case to go to the same committee, because it treated this inquiry as one in which the Chicago Tribune was plaintiff instead of treating it as one in which the Senate of the United States was an investigator. They treated it as if it was there only as a judge to try what was proved and whatever might be offered by the Chicago Tribune. It sat there in a capacity to enable it to be taken advantage of, in a way that the Senator has indicated, if such was done, and that is one reason why I can not vote for this case to go back to the committee, because it did not seem to think it was clothed with inquisitorial powers.

Mr. President, in saying that I can not vote for it to go back to the committee I want it to be distinctly understood that our difference is not a personal one, but purely one of judgment, and that as one member of a court can dissent without in any way reflecting upon the motives or the judgment or the wisdom or the ability of his associates, so can we in this case dissent from the judgment of the committee and vote against the resolution that this case should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

But, Mr. President, it is urged that it will be a lack of confidence in the Committee on Privileges and Elections unless we send this case to that committee. I do not agree with that for the reasons which I have stated. I contend, Mr. President, that we do not show any lack of confidence in the Committee on Privileges and Elections by ordering a new investigation, although I say that the former investigation by that committee was not a success, but a failure. But, if we are to apply this rule of lack of confidence, where will it lead us? If it be a lack of confidence in the Committee on Privileges and Elections for the Senate to send this case to any other committee, by the same reasoning would it not be a lack of confidence on the part of the Committee on Privileges and Elections not to send the case to the same subcommittee that had it before; in fact, it ought to go, on the parity of reasoning, to the same subcommittee, and if the gentlemen of that subcommittee are as true and loyal to the principles which they have announced as their supporters advise us we should be to the Committee on Privileges and Elections would they not adhere to the same scope and the same principles under which they conducted the former inquiry? I venture the opinion that if this investigation goes to that same subcommittee, and it prescribes it and narrows it and hedges it about with the same limitations it did on the former investigation, that committee would bring in the same report. And to carry one step further this rule of "lack of confidence" that subcommittee would bring in the same report to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and would it not be lack of confidence for the full Committee on Privileges and Elections not to adopt the report of that committee? One step further around the circle and then it will be complete. Would it not finally be a lack of confidence in the Senate not to adopt the report of the full committee? And then after having traveled the entire circumference of the circle we would be back where we are to-day.

Mr. President, there is another doctrine which is sought to be invoked in this case from which I must dissent, and I do it with the greatest possible hesitation and with the profoundest respect for this body. I do it with the greatest possible hesitation because I am totally lacking in seniority in both service and years, but I want to say that I have heard much in the last few days of the doctrine of "senatorial sensitiveness," and since the few weeks I have been in this Chamber I have heard even more of the doctrine of "senatorial courtesy." While during my term of service here I will try to let no Senator be more courteous in his manner and demeanor toward his fellow Senators than myself, and I will try in no way to wound the feelings or sensibilities of any Senator, I want to say at the outset of my term of service that I have no sympathy with "senatorial courtesy" and "senatorial sensitiveness" to the extent it has been attempted to invoke them in this case.

Often when a Senator starts in a certain direction, impelled by a sense of duty, he finds he must stop, his progress blocked by a barrier which is called "senatorial courtesy." But if he is able to circumvent that barrier and go forward, nevertheless, in the same direction, he is again immediately halted by another barrier, and it is called "senatorial sensitiveness."

Or, Mr. President, if I were to change the metaphor, I would say if the dose of "senatorial courtesy" is compounded with "senatorial sensitiveness," I am afraid it will soon render our service ineffective, and the result of the compounded dose might be called "senatorial asphyxiation." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, as was so truly said by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] the other day, the true relation between the people of the United States and the Senator is that of principal and agent. If I were to prescribe any general rule which I would follow during my term of service it would be to try to do no act as agent that I would not be willing to do if I were principal instead of agent.

And now let us apply that rule to these facts. As I understand it, from the meager information I have been able to get, the former investigation cost approximately $13,000, an insignificantly small sum in comparison with the enormous income of the Government and its enormous expenditures. But it is the sum total of these small items which makes the final grand total so large.

Now, Mr. President, let us suppose this case. Suppose any one of us here had employed a certain lawyer to conduct a certain case for us and that his viewpoint of the case had been too narrow; that his conception of the rules of evidence had been wrong, and as a result thereof he had lost the case, but that he had been fortunate enough not only by his service but by the service of other new attorneys to gain a motion for a new trial. Let us assume further that the conduct and trial of that case had cost the plaintiff $10,000. Would any of us, if we were plaintiffs, reemploy that same attorney who had made a failure of that case because we were afraid if we did not reemploy him we would wound his sensitiveness, or be guilty of an act of discourtesy?

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. LEA. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would the Senator think it would be a violation of any rule if the attorney had lost the case upon the evidence he was able to produce and other evidence had been discovered? Would you change the attorney in order to have the benefit of the newly discovered testimony?

Mr. LEA. Of course not, but the Senator's suggestion is not in point——

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LEA. Just a moment and then I will yield. Because the evidence is here, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, or we would not be ordering another investigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LEA. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that the Senator from Idaho has contended that the subcommittee acted in a judicial capacity. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he ever heard of a judge, after he had decided a case and dissatisfaction arose and a new trial was granted, being solicitous about getting the trial of the case again?

Mr. LEA. I will say to the Senator if I have heard of such a case, under those circumstances, I would be all the more unwilling to submit it to such a judge.

But if my illustration in regard to a lawyer was not happy, I will try one in regard to the medical profession. Let us assume a Senator fell ill, and having the symptoms of appendicitis, employed a general practitioner, a man who was not an expert, and no one would claim that this committee was particularly expert in that line of endeavor. Suppose this general practitioner had performed an operation which had endangered the life of the patient and for which he had received a very large fee, but that in performing an operation for appendicitis he had failed to find the appendix. Let us suppose that this same patient fell ill again with the same malady; would he reemploy the same surgeon who had failed to find the appendix for fear he would wound his feelings or be guilty of discourtesy?

So, Mr. President, I maintain in this case that the former committee did not find the appendix of corruption, that another operation is necessary, and for one I want to employ a new surgeon.

In summing up what I have said, because I disagree with the former committee in its conception of its functions, in the scope of its inquiry, in its rules of evidence, and in its failure to place WILLIAM LORIMER and Edward Hines upon the stand and examine them, I can not vote for the resolution, which, in the opinion of some Senators would be regarded as approving the course of that committee, but I must vote for it to go to a special committee that will be raised upon the floor of the Senate. I must do this for the reasons I have given, and for the additional reason that if it was my money that was to be expended in this investigation, and even if I had all the resources of the United States behind me, I would not reemploy the committee which had made a failure of the former investigation; and because I would not do this as principal I will not do it as agent.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I had not intended to occupy any time of the Senate in this discussion, but I find myself in the same position as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and in accord with his sentiments; and being a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and being compelled under my conscience as I see my duty to vote against referring this case to that committee, I want simply to give a few of the reasons for the belief that actuates me. I realize that a new Senator is expected to accept the advice of St. Paul to the Corinthians regarding women, "Let them keep silence in the churches"; but as that injunction is sometimes broken, and as the Senator from Tennessee has broken the tradition here to-day, I may be excused for still further violating it.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has said that "this matter is being tried everywhere else." He is exactly right. I have been, during the last week, down in the beautiful southland in States whose Senators have possibly voted on this question before. It is being discussed and it is being tried there. I have been out on the prairies of Iowa, where we understand not what it means to secure seats in the United States Senate by trickery or bribery or corruption of any kind, and it is being tried there. It is absolutely true that it is being tried everywhere—on the farms, in the house of business, around the firesides of the Nation. Public sentiment in this country, which you may sneer at at times and pay no attention to, has decreed that this investigation shall be complete, without any technicality, without any attempt to protect anybody, however high or low it may reach. Whether we believe it or not we realize the force and power and value of public sentiment. It is an abhorrent thing to me that the head of a great Lumber Trust can sit on the fine upholstered lounges of a club, glancing into a cocktail and surrounded by the aroma of a cigar, boast of how they have spent a hundred thousand dollars to "put over" an election of a man to the United States Senate. Who are "they"? If Mr. Hines has that information, we want a committee that will make Mr. Hines produce that information.

I have the greatest respect for the Committee on Privileges and Elections, especially for its honored chairman, the great lawyer from the State of Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]; but if that subcommittee, in its previous investigation, could not discover that this same party, who is now boasting of the money they spent, had anything to do with it—with the papers full of it, the air full of it—they could not have conducted a very thorough investigation.

This question goes further than Mr. LORIMER. He sinks into insignificance. We know him not; it is a question of this Senate being on trial, and the whole form of government being on trial. It is a more important question than any other before the Senate. Shall men come here to make laws under these circumstances? Shall they come as representatives of special interests, or shall they come to represent the people? If Mr. Hines is correct—if the Lumber Trust furnished the money—what does the Lumber Trust expect back? If the Beef Trust furnished the money, what is the quid pro quo for the Beef Trust? Our Senators and Representatives dictate, largely, the appointment of district attorneys. District attorneys prosecute these trusts. The question goes to that far-reaching extent. If Mr. Hines, with his Lumber Trust, has contributed, has it been for the purpose of getting a district attorney to prosecute the Lumber Trust? If the Beef Trust has contributed, has it been for the purpose of getting a district attorney to prosecute the Beef Trust? This is one feature of the case that has come to me painfully, because I have seen the withering blight of Lorimerism in many kinds of prosecutions.

The country is tired of a half-hearted investigation. This matter "smells to heaven," and the people appeal to and believe in the Democrats as well as Republicans uniting in the formation of a committee that they will be perfectly satisfied with—one that will go to the bottom of the matter without fear or favor. It is no imputation against the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I am a member of that committee. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is a member of that committee; but that committee made up its mind on the former testimony. There is a certain pride of opinion in all of this. If a case is tried and goes to an upper court and is reversed, if we have been beaten, we are not satisfied, generally, as lawyers, to try that case bfore the same court, but we prefer a new court. So here there should be a new committee.

We are, however, met with "senatorial courtesy." I am mystified by "senatorial courtesy." It seems to me that as to almost everything you try to do in the Senate it is suggested, "Look out; you are offending 'senatorial courtesy.'" Senatorial courtesy can not be a cloak to prevent men from voting their honest convictions. It shall never be with me. The people of this country are interested in this proposition—more interested in it than they are in senatorial courtesy—it goes to the very root of this Government, and having a deep interest in and love for this Government, they intend to go through with the proceeding and have a thorough investigation made, even though it may jar the somewhat dilapidated fetish of senatorial courtesy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the substitute resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, just before the vote is taken I want to say a final word, if I may have the further indulgence of the Senate.

The Senate is about to determine whether it will send the Lorimer case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections as organized and appointed by the secret conferences and caucuses of the Republican and Democratic Parties in the Senate, or whether it will send this case to a special committee elected in open session by Senators.

Public interest—the principle that all action of this body should be influenced by no consideration save that of the general good—demands that the Senate itself should choose the committee which is to make the investigation.

I protest, Mr. President, against sending this case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections because nine members of that committee, as now organized, have formed and expressed settled convictions upon it. I do not mean to say that new evidence has not been discovered since they adjudged and determined this case, but I do mean to say that they could not well claim that such new evidence would change their votes. When these Senators ask to again take charge of this case because new testimony has been discovered, I want to be recorded as saying that no new testimony has been discovered that can by any possibility change the convictions of a man who voted that WILLIAM LORIMER was entitled to a seat in the Senate.

The new testimony does not at all affect the credibility of the evidence that the four legislators, White, Link, Beckemeyer, and Holstlaw, were bribed. Not a word of the testimony taken by the committee of the Illinois Legislature goes to the question of whether Lee O'Neil Browne, Broderick, or Wilson bribed those four members of the legislature. What I mean is, that the new testimony which has induced members of this committee to express an eagerness and a willingness again to take possession of this case does not in the slightest degree aid in determining whether the seven witnesses, believed by 40 Members of this Senate to have been bribed, were or were not bribed.

If you commit this case to a committee controlled by nine Members who rejected the proof of the guilt of the seven bribe takers and bribe givers upon the evidence reported by that committee last session, you will have no right to expect them to return a different judgment upon any new testimony discovered up to the present time. There is no new evidence here to alter their judgment as to the corruption of those seven legislators. And mark what I say! No committee who regarded those seven votes as untainted will ever find enough new testimony to cause it to report or vote to unseat LORIMER.

Nearly all of the report of the committee of the Senate which was sent out to ascertain whether or not LORIMER's seat was bought is devoted to an attempt to show that the law officers of Cook and Sangamon Counties had used their power to suborn witnesses to commit perjury to prove that LORIMER had secured his seat here by bribery.

This report occupies four and one-half pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is given over to an arraignment of the law officers of Cook County and of Sagnamon County, putting them on trial before the Senate, instead of this organization, composed, Mr. President—and I choose my words carefully—composed of the Beef Trust, the Lumber Trust, and kindred interests which set out to buy a seat on the floor of the Senate. I say this because it is time it should be said here. Senatorial seats should not be on the bargain counter for great interests to buy.

Now, Mr. President, what does that committee say? I quote from their report:

> The circumstances before referred to—

That is, referred to in their arraignment of the law officers who were struggling against all the obstacles that the criminal law interposes for the protection of the accused—

> The circumstances before referred to, and many others which might be instanced, tended to render the testimony of each and all the witnesses who have been named of doubtful value—

White, Link, Beckemeyer, Holstlaw, Lee O'Neil Browne, and Broderick. Broderick was permitted by the committee to testify what he wanted to about the transaction, and then, in violation of every rule of evidence, to withhold his testimony as to the balance of the transaction on the ground that it would tend to incriminate him.

Are Senators who are charged to-day with the responsibility of reopening this case to a genuine investigation for the honor of the Senate and the integrity of this Government willing to intrust it to a committee seven members of which joined in that report and nine members of which, as it is at present constituted, voted to sustain that report? You are weighing in the balance senatorial courtesy on the one side and the honor of the Senate on the other. These may be disagreeable sentiments to proclaim here, but, Mr. President, the Senate will be compelled to hear such sentiments repeated until that time when it rears the standard of public service higher than the standard of senatorial politeness and courtesy.

I quote further from this report:

> And in each case in which it was claimed that some member of the Illinois General Assembly had been bribed to vote for Mr. LORIMER the accusation was positively denied by the person accused of committing the alleged act of bribery.

The committee to which it is proposed to entrust this important matter emphasizes that in its report to establish title to the seat of WILLIAM LORIMER. Is it so unusual—and convincing—for accused persons to make "positive" denial of guilt?

> It is, however, declared that if the four witnesses before named were bribed to vote for Mr. LORIMER, those who bribed them were equally guilty, and that the votes of Browne, Broderick, and Wilson should also be excluded.

Now, direct your attention to this:

> But the committee can find no warrant in the testimony for believing that either one of said legislators was moved by any corrupt influence.

There is not a scintilla of evidence in this new testimony that will help that same committee, or men so minded, to arrive at a different conclusion.

As to the four legislators who confessed to receiving bribes, namely, White, Link, Beckemeyer, and Holstlaw, or the three members of the legislature, namely, Browne, Broderick, and Wilson, who were proven to have paid over the bribe money, there is no new testimony which could, by any possibility within the operation of any of the known laws of pyschology, work upon the mind of this committee to bring them to a different conclusion. They rejected their testimony before, and, as there is no new evidence bearing directly upon that feature of the case, they would, of course, again reject the testimony of these men. It may fairly be assumed that two other members of the committee, as at present constituted, who were Members of the Senate, who voted to retain LORIMER in his seat on this report, and who adopted the reasons and the conclusions of the committee, will find themselves in the same position. So it must be expected that 9 of the 15 members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as at present organized, would, as men who had honestly decided that—

> The committee can find no warrant in the testimony for believing that either one of said legislators was moved by any corrupt influence, be compelled upon the same reasoning again to reject the testimony that the votes of White, Link, Beckemeyer, Holstlaw, Lee O'Neil Browne, Broderick, and Wilson were corrupt.

And that, Mr. President, would leave this case on the testimony that Mr. Hines had boasted that he had raised a hundred-thousand-dollar fund, and had solicited contributions from interests he thought would be willing to contribute. That is the new testimony. Hines, of course, will come in and deny it. There is, too, the testimony of Jandus, and about the only thing proved regarding him is that he made an investment of a very considerable sum of money, aggregating about $5,500, in Montana lands which he could not explain. Jandus will also deny that he was bribed.

The testimony as to Mr. McMackin and Mr. Blair and Mr. Campbell and Mr. Taylor is of much the same character. They also may be expected to enter denials of corrupt acts.

If a committee would reject the testimony that was offered as to the bribery of these seven legislators, what is there to give the Senate hope that it can purge its good name by sending the case, with the new testimony, to the same committee or to a body of men controlled by those who stood with that committee?

Mr. President, the Senate to-day is confronted with one of the gravest responsibilities that has come to it since it has been my privilege to be one of its Members.

Senators may speak in scorn of public opinion, and may cite instances in criticism of men who have not read all of the voluminous record in this case. It is perfectly apparent that the Committee on Privileges and Elections last session adopted its report without having read the testimony. I assert that there is no Senator on this floor who was then a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections who can rise in his place and say that between Saturday, December 17, when the full record of printed testimony was for the first time laid before the committee, and the following Tuesday, when they made their report, he had read all that testimony and weighed it all. I venture the assertion that there is not one Senator who will say that he did.

We know perfectly well that the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections followed the members of the subcommittee who had been sent out to make this investigation; and, Mr. President, the members of that subcommittee have been arraigned here to-day because they adopted rules under which they conducted the investigation that were unsupported by precedent or authority. I had forborne to do it, but other Senators have taken up the procedure of this subcommittee, point by point, and have demonstrated that it was fatally defective. So I submit to the Senate now that we can ill afford to send this case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

It has been said in the course of the debate this afternoon that it is perfectly understood that the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia, if adopted by the Senate, will not be followed by the committee. That resolution, which was offered as a substitute for the one I presented, provides that this committee of 15 shall investigate this case in banc, all the members serving. If that be adopted, then we shall have a vote of confidence by the Senate in the 15 members of that committee who were selected by secret conference and caucus.

The time is coming, Mr. President, when members of committees will be selected in open Senate on a primary vote, as members of both parties now vote in many States to nominate their candidates for their respective tickets. The day is at hand when the Senate will be democratized and made more nearly to represent public interest than it has in recent years—than it does now.

Mr. President, I take the time of the Senate now to cast a little backward glance. During the first 75 or 80 years of the life of this Republic there was no such thing as corruption in public life.

Now, I do not mean that there were not instances of corruption, for there were. There have always been sporadic cases where individuals have betrayed public trust. I do mean to say that nothing like systematic organized corruption was known then. For 75 or 80 years after the adoption of the Constitution, this Government was truly representative. Why? Because business had not been made a part of government.

And then came a change, a change that I do not hold individuals accountable for, a change that I think was inevitable. It put upon us responsibilities which it was destined in the course of civilization we should bear.

I believe that we will be able to meet those responsibilities, sir. I believe that here in this New World there is to be worked out ultimately in its perfection the problem of self-government. I believe, sir, that here was the best chance for it that the whole history of the human race had afforded. We did not have to build on the old ruins of other and obsolete forms of government. We had a clean foundation, primitive conditions. But we were given the richest country in all the world, and this very richness made it impossible that business could always be conducted as it was during the first 75 or 80 years of the life of this Republic—on an individual or on a partnership basis. It was necessary to bring into life and being a new institution to conduct business and develop the country—the modern corporation.

With the modern corporation came the necessity of bringing business and government into close contact. About that period of time the agents of business interests appeared as an organized lobby at the Capital of the Nation. They began to go to the assemblies and to the senates in the different States, seeking franchises, seeking special privileges, and special immunities; and then, for the first time, business was brought into the most intimate relationship with the Government. Then, too, for the first time, temptation came into the life of the Representative, and it was a question whether he would yield to the importunities of the public-service and other corporations or stand for public interest.

You will find, in studying this subject, that systematic corruption in Government made its first appearance at that period of our life when the corporations began to take charge of the development of the country; when they began to tunnel mountains, to bridge great rivers, to build great lines of roads, to start great industrial enterprises such as the world never had seen before. Then it was, I say, that corruption began to undermine representative government. From that hour to this its virus has been spreading into every fiber of our political system.

There came a time, in 1897, when conditions were favorable to a still further development of this business organization which had already begun to destroy the representative character of our Government. In three years the consolidation of great corporations outran anything known before in the experience of this or any other country, and from that time to this it has continued.

And so we are to-day confronted by conditions altogether different from any that have ever before been known in the history of this Republic. We need not delude ourselves that the great public does not understand this. The people know all about it. They understand perfectly well that when the corporations had to go to their State legislatures to get franchises, and to Congress to get special privileges and land grants, the scandals, the great, organized scandals, appeared.

Our business development has its successive stages. It passed from the period when business was first transacted by individuals and partnership into the period when it was transacted by corporations, and when those corporations were honestly in competition with each other. Then came the period when those corporations made combinations to destroy competition. Now we are in the period when those combinations have been consolidated and combined to subjugate all the commercial, industrial, and financial institutions of the American people.

Mr. President, I say to you that an investigation proves the Lorimer case to be one of the manifestations of that great power working itself out to install here in this body, whose traditions ought to make it secure from such contamination, a man who comes not with the high sanction of the people of his State to represent the public interest, but who comes here commissioned to serve special interests. Mr. Hines said to LORIMER in his sworn testimony which I have read here, "Can not the interests unite on you?"

And they did unite "on you"—on LORIMER—and they elected him.

Mr. President, I am not going to comment upon the organization of this committee, with nine men on it who, in the face of all this testimony, voted that LORIMER'S seat was untainted, with only two men on it who voted against him, and with only three new men. I cite it in passing as a fact worthy of the attention of the Senate. I believe I would violate my oath as a Member of this body if I put the feelings of any individual Senator or of any committee above service to the country. Talk about truckling to public opinion and deciding cases with "one eye on the record and one eye on the mob!" Talk about the courage of ignoring public demand! Let me say to you, Mr. President, out of some 15 or 20 years' experience in public life, it takes at least equal, if not more, courage to stand up in the United States Senate and fight for public interest.

It has been suggested that a perfect understanding has been reached. This suggestion came from the Democratic side. It would thus appear that those who had to do with naming and are controlling the committees on the Republican side and those who are controlling the committees on the Democratic side have arrived at an understanding that if this substitute is adopted and goes to the Committee on Privileges and Elections it is not to be carried out. That is what has been said here in the course of this debate.

Mr. BACON. What does the Senator from Wisconsin mean by that remark?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I mean just what was stated on this floor; that instead of this committee of 15 serving in banc, as stated in this resolution, it is understood—at least it has been so asserted by a Democratic Member on this floor—that there will be appointed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections a subcommittee consisting of four Members who voted for LORIMER, of three who did not vote on the Lorimer case, and of one who voted against him, and that committee is to be the subcommittee to make this investigation.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will.

Mr. BACON. The language used by him at the time I ventured to interrupt him in the time of his very earnest remarks was such as to indicate that the Senator meant to imply that all the Senators on the Republican side and all the Senators on the Democratic side who would support the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia were a party to an agreement of that kind.

I desire to say to the Senate and to the Senator that such a statement or such an imputation is absolutely unwarranted, so far as I am concerned, and, as I believe, so far as others are concerned. What may have been said among themselves by Senators who may be upon that committee and who may have conferred as to what the future course should be I know nothing. I am not on that committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am aware of the fact that the Senator from Georgia is not on that committee.

Mr. BACON. I am, however, one of the Senators who have been indicated——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that; and I will ask the Senator now if he has heard no intimation of the fact that a committee of this sort would be appointed?

Mr. BACON. I have heard discussions as to what that committee should be, but as to any agreement about it——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh——

Mr. BACON. The Senator can not wave me aside in any such way.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; and the Senator——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator permits me to interrupt him, he must permit me to go ahead. If not, I will wait until he concludes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will give you full opportunity; proceed.

Mr. BACON. I simply mean this, that when the Senator makes any suggestion that the support of the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia has been conditioned upon any agreement of that kind or any understanding of that kind, the Senator is speaking utterly without warrant and wide of the mark.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to say for myself, if the Senator will permit me the statement further, that I did not undertake to join issue with the Senator in any degree until he put what I considered to be an imputation upon myself, at least, if he included me in the number, because I intend to support the resolution of the Senator from Virginia.

I wish to say that I am going to support it simply because I have full confidence that whatever committee is appointed, whether it be under the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin or a committee under the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia, it is going to be a most thorough and exhaustive investigation. I would not give my support, nor do I believe that any of my colleagues would give their support, to any measure that they did not think would have a result such as I have indicated, because if there ever was an occasion which demands and requires the fullest and most exhaustive investigation this occasion now presents itself.

The Senator and I differ as to what is essential to secure that. If I thought as he does I would vote the way he is going to vote. But my confidence in the result of the examination in the one case is as great as it would be in the other. In other words, I have full confidence that the committee which is sought to be raised by the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin would make a thorough and an exhaustive investigation. I have equal full confidence that any committee raised, either the full committee or any subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, will also make a thorough and an exhaustive examination.

I only ventured to interrupt the Senator because I am not willing that it should appear that I am casting my vote in consequence of any agreement or any condition. I shall cast it in the full sense of my obligation as a Senator to do all in my power and to assist in such measures as in my judgment will lead to a proper and thorough investigation in this case.

What the Senator from Wisconsin said was an implication that Senators might be guided by other considerations than I have thus announced.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have yielded to an extended speech by the Senator from Georgia, and I will answer him now. I do not want to be misunderstood, and I shall not be. I have been a Member of this Senate for five years. I have understood perfectly well how these "understandings" have been entered into without being called agreements, and I say that at this time it is perfectly understood on this floor that if this resolution is sent to the committee the investigation will not be conducted in the manner provided by the terms of that resolution—that is, by the full committee—although the resolution provides that it shall be so conducted.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield for an interruption.

Mr. BACON. I wish simply to say, Mr. President, so far as concerns what the Senator says, that there can be understandings without understandings, that if he applies that to what I say the Senator is without warrant in his statement to that effect. It is absolutely without foundation, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am going to say that during the time I have been a Member of this Senate, I have on many occasions, as Senators conversed among themselves at their desks, when votes similar to this were about to be taken, listened to comments that it was "understood" that this thing or that thing was to be done. I have heard the same comment about this resolution, and I have every reason to believe, from what has been said to me privately on this floor, that there is an understanding that this committee of fifteen is not to make this investigation, that the Senate is to send it to that committee upon the votes—maybe there are some Senators who do not understand that—of enough Senators who do understand it to be the situation to insure the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator turns to me and says there may not be——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; I do not mean to imply any want of confidence in the Senator.

Mr. BACON. When I make a statement on the floor in regard to myself, I do not put it upon matters of uncertainty and possibility.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is not any occasion for the Senator to take to himself any personal offense from anything I have said to him just now or anything I will ever say to him. But, Mr. President, for one I am done with this kind of business, and I purpose to use my voice and what power I have as a Member of this body against the transaction of the public business in any other place except in the open Senate, where it will appear in the RECORD.

I reviewed, Mr. President, on another day while this resolution was pending, the system of building up the committees in the Senate; how, in the first place, caucuses are called upon both sides.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. For the relief of the Senator from Georgia, if any relief is necessary, I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the Senator from Georgia was not present when any understanding was reached about this matter, and several other Senators were not present, but it was distinctly understood that this committee should be composed of eight Members, just as the Senator from Wisconsin states it. I want the truth to be known here.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator from Arkansas. I was not present, of course. I had understood from the statement made in open Senate here by the Senator from Oklahoma that there was such an "understanding," and I was simply proceeding to base what observations I had to make upon that statement.

Mr. President, I submitted a few days ago some observations upon the building up of the committees of the Senate in caucuses held by either party. I outlined the proceeding—how somebody arises in the caucus and moves that the chairman of the caucus appoint a committee on committees. That motion, as a matter of course, carries. The committee on committees is appointed by the chairman of the caucus and the committee on committees proceeds to make up the committees of the Senate. The committee on committees very largely defers to the chairman of the committee on committees. Thus the authority, which has been delegated to us by the legislatures of our respective States to represent the people of this country, is delegated by the two parties to their respective caucuses, and delegated in their respective caucuses to one man who happens to be chairman of the caucus on that occasion, and delegated by that one man again to a committee which he appoints, and largely delegated by that committee to the chairman of the committee. This chairman, therefore, wields almost absolute power in the selection of the members of the committees that control the legislation of this body.

What I am stating now goes directly to the composition of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It bears also upon the control of the legislation for two years in the Senate of the United States. Thus, in a brief space of time, in a caucus covering, it may be, not more than a period of five minutes, there has been delegated to one man in that caucus a power which—when it is delegated and redelegated and delegated again—works out finally in the selection of committees that absolutely shape and mold legislation in the Senate of the United States during the life of that Congress.

I contend that is undemocratic, unrepublican, un-American, and I want to say, Mr. President, that same thing carried into party politics has been the occasion for the enactment of the direct primary, and the demand for a more direct expression of the public voice which are heard upon all sides and which will not be answered until written into statute law.

Let me say to Senators here that the Senate of the United States is not great and powerful enough to escape reformation. We have approached nearly to the time when we are going to see an end of the control of the legislation of this body by a few men who determine the character of the standing committees of the Senate.

Mr. President, a couple of years ago a resolution was introduced in this body by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]. That resolution was sent to the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia. When the committees of the Senate are being arranged, that committee does not receive much attention. It is not expected to be a committee of any importance; almost anybody is assigned to it, and I was given a place on that committee. [Laughter.] So was the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] and one or two other Senators. It was regarded as a perfectly "safe" committee on which to place men who might prove troublesome on important committees.

Now, Mr. President, when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] introduced his resolution, which was an inquiry into the capitalization of the Washington Gas Co., he asked to have it referred to this committee of which he was a member. It was referred to that committee. Then the Senator from Nebraska and I conferred about that resolution and broadened it a good deal so as to provide for an investigation of the true value of the property of the Washington Gas Co., with a view, you know, to determining the basis upon which they should charge rates.

Well, that resolution was amended and reported back to the Senate. It was purposed to have it go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, in order that we might be authorized to subpœna witnesses and employ a stenographer and make other necessary expenditures. Then a fight took place on the floor.

The Committee on the District of Columbia claimed that resolution. This opened the contest. Of course, it was fought out on a high plane. There was not a word said as to how the resolution itself was to be affected by sending it to that committee, but many things were said privately among Members on the floor here about what would happen. Many Members said, "Of course if it goes to the Committee on the District of Columbia it never will be heard of again." It was common talk on the floor here that the Committee on the District of Columbia had been so organized that such a resolution could never be reported out.

It did go to that committee by vote of the Senate. It never came out. It died the death there. That is just one instance. I cite that committee merely as an illustration. It is not different from many other important committees in the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. OWEN. If it would not interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin, I should like to call attention to the fact that in the Sixtieth Congress, when I first entered this body, I introduced a resolution providing for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, and it went to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and died the death; and in the Sixty-first Congress I did the same thing, and again it died the death.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, that is the old, old story. When I came to the Senate in 1906 I introduced a bill for the valuation of railroad property. That is one of the many bills I introduced. That bill was sound in principle. It was sustained by the highest authority of the country. For years it had been recommended by the Interstate Commerce Commission as essential to any right basis for the making and the regulation of rates. I introduced that bill in 1906. I also introduced it as an amendment to the Hepburn-Dolliver bill which was pending before the Senate. Only seven Republican Senators voted for it. The Interstate Commerce Commission had said they could not ascertain a reasonable rate excepting upon a valuation of the physical railway property of the country, and it had appealed to Congress in every report since 1903 for authority to ascertain the value of railway property in this country. Yet, Mr. President, under this iniquitous system here in the Senate the committees were organized so that it made no difference how strong were the reasons, how strong the appeal, how righteous the cause, you could not get out of the Committee on Interstate Commerce a bill to ascertain the value of the railway property of this country.

I introduced that bill in 1906; I introduced it in 1907, in both sessions; I introduced it in 1908, in both sessions; I reintroduced it in 1909, in both sessions. I have introduced it at every session since I have been a Member of this body. I have had the support of the Interstate Commerce Commission for identically the bill that I have introduced. I have appealed to the chairman of the committee time after time. I pursued the chairman of that committee for weeks and months around the Capitol to get a meeting of the committee so I might have a hearing on that bill.

Mr. President, a system like that throttles democracy, it destroys representative government; and the Senate of the United States can not maintain such a system. It will go down, as it ought to go down, before a righteous public opinion.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I send to the desk a telegram which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE HOUSE, Springfield, Ill., June 1.

CHARLES G. BENNETT,
Secretary United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I forward you to-day by express copy of evidence and copy of report of Helm investigating committee and copy of resolution adopted by State senate.

J. H. PADDOCK, Secretary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Idaho for bringing me back to the Lorimer case. I wandered somewhat afield, I confess, although I do contend, Senators, that what I have had to say about these committees is pertinent to the resolution upon which you are now to vote. I believe that every American citizen and I believe that every Senator right down in his heart must recognize the soundness and the wisdom of submitting this case to a new committee, a committee composed of Senators who have not taken part in any proceedings in this case up to the point of passing judgment upon it. There is something in the human mind that, after it once records its judgment, makes difficult the reforming of that judgment.

I believe, Mr. President and Senators, that we ought to submit this matter to a new committee. I do not feel about it just as if it were a matter of submitting it to a jury, because we have got to act as judges as well as jurors finally in this case. We can not get rid of that, as suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] the other day. But there is another office that falls upon this committee of investigation—that of exploring for testimony, that of pursuing every clue, that of hunting down and bringing to the Senate of the United States every fact that has a bearing on this case; for I say to you, Senators, this case is a good deal bigger than Mr. LORIMER; it is vastly more important than the great Commonwealth of Illinois. I want to see a committee, Mr. President, that will pursue this investigation to the high places in this land, to the most powerful commercial organizations in the country, and lay bare the secrets which are there housed and concealed relating to the election of Senator LORIMER and to other and very important matters which deeply concern this Government.

I believe, Mr. President, we should select a committee that is absolutely free. I believe that it is better for the Committee on Privileges and Elections if we do so. I can not conceive of a judge before whom I ever tried a case, to whom I applied for a new trial upon newly discovered testimony, arguing and pleading and struggling to retain the case for retrial. I trust the Senate will not be misled by any feeling of sentiment, but will meet the situation with directness and submit this investigation to the control of a committee composed of new men who were not Members when the Senate passed upon the LORIMER case before.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I desire to say, in view of the remarks made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], that the resolution offered by me as a substitute for that offered by the Senator from Wisconsin represented my individual views and my individual opinions, and that it was offered on my individual responsibility as a Member of this body. I do not mean to say that I did not consult with other Senators and did not have the advice and assistance of other Senators in treating this matter; but certainly no Senator gave his assent to the resolution offered by me except upon his own judgment and his own individual responsibility as a Senator.

I can go further, Mr. President, and say that I have not solicited the support of a single Senator for the resolution which was offered by me. Every Member in this body is as free and as independent as I am, and any Senator who votes for the resolution votes his own convictions and votes on his own responsibility.

I desire to go further, Mr. President, and say that no Senator will vote, so far as I know or believe, by reason of any agreement or understanding, open or secret or otherwise, but he will vote his independent judgment as he thinks he ought to vote.

At the time I offered the resolution, Mr. President, it was my confident expectation that this investigation would be conducted by the full committee. The resolution provided that the committee should sit in banc in making this investigation. Of course, that simply meant that a majority should do so; it did not mean that every Member should be present; but it meant to repel the idea that the committee should act through a subcommittee. It intended to require that the action taken should be the action of the full committee, for the reason that there was a legal impediment in the way of having the subcommittee act in the premises.

The committee must be a committee of the Senate in order, under the law of the land, to exercise full powers in dealing with cases of contempt. That being a criminal procedure, there was grave doubt, if indeed there was not a certainty, whether a subcommittee would have jurisdiction to act efficiently in a case of contempt. It was therefore provided that the committee should sit in banc, to repel the idea that they should undertake to make this investigation through a subcommittee.

In the progress of that matter, Mr. President, the argument was made that the Committee on Privileges and Elections was too large a body to conduct this investigation efficiently; it was argued that it would take from the Senate, at a time when the presence of Senators was required, too large a number of the membership of the Senate away from Washington to visit Springfield, Chicago, and perhaps other places. It did seem that there was a good deal of force in the argument. I talked freely with Senators on both sides of the Chamber in respect to that difficulty, and the opinion was expressed to me that the full Committee on Privileges and Elections would find it necessary to designate a special committee. I call it a "special committee," because they can not act through a subcommittee. In view of the conversation held by me on that subject with Members of the Senate on both sides of the Chamber, I became satisfied that such a conclusion would be inevitable; that the Committee on Privileges and Elections would find it necessary to act through a special committee composed of a lesser number than 15 Senators. I myself not only felt that that would be necessary, but I found that the membership of the Committee on Privileges and Elections agreed with me and expressed that opinion; and that was the basis of the statement made by me in the few remarks which I submitted the other day, that I would put this responsibility up to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and they would have to deal with it in banc, as a whole, or through such other agency as they might see fit to provide and recommend to the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Virginia does not intend to give the Senate the impression that he conferred with all the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, does he?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I did not intentionally do so, and I do not think my remarks bear that construction. If so, I cheerfully make the correction, for I did not so intend.

Mr. JONES. I am sure of that.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I talked with some members of the committee, but not with all. After those conversations I was of the opinion that it was the purpose of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to recommend to the Senate a special committee, composed of perhaps eight members.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator has just stated, does he not think that the suggestion I made the other day, that all these resolutions really ought to be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, would be the best course to take? I take it that the Senator's idea now is that we should pass this resolution directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to sit in banc, but without any idea that it would do so; and that it would bring in some other course of procedure to recommend to the Senate. Therefore it would seem to me—and I am still of the opinion that I was the other day—that it would be far better to refer all these resolutions to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and let that committee bring out such resolution as it thought would propose the best course for the Senate to take.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before we pass from the question of a full committee, I wish to remind the Senator from Virginia of the fact that, if I mistake not, in the Smoot case from Utah and in the Clark case from Montana the full Committee on Privileges and Elections sat in this city, heard all the testimony, and made its report.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, undoubtedly the full Committee on Privileges and Elections could sit in this city, though that might be attended with some inconvenience. It is equally true that the full committee might sit in other cities, but in other cities the inconveniences would be still greater. It was suggested that in this case, under the conditions existing in the Senate at this time, it would be desirable to have a lesser number delegated and given the full authority of the Senate. I say that this idea came along after I introduced my resolution, for I introduced the resolution with the full purpose of having the entire committee make the investigation, and I provided that the investigation should be made in banc, so as to prevent any subcommittee being created for the purpose. It was only after considerable discussion and a considerable lapse of time, when so often the argument was made to me in discussing the resolution which I had offered that it would not do to have the whole 15 or the majority of 15 Senators away from the business of the Senate at this time, that I considered the question of a lesser committee, and discussing it, I say, with members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I found a strong sentiment in favor of a smaller committee. Indeed I thought I might conclude with safety that it was the purpose of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to designate a smaller committee.

Mr. DILLINGHAM and Mr. BROWN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield, and to whom?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield first to the Senator from Vermont, and then I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I want to say that there never has been a conference in the Committee on Privileges and Elections in relation to this matter, but I have heard everything that has been said, I think, on both sides of the Chamber in relation to it. Two or three days ago when the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], I think it was, was pending, providing for the appointment of a special committee of a smaller number, I made the remark here that, in looking over the condition of the work of that committee and the size of it, I had myself reached the conclusion that in all probability they would be obliged at some stage of the proceedings to ask for the appointment of a subcommittee to carry on the work of the committee, and when I introduced a resolution on the 22d instant, it was substantially the same as that of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I purposely avoided mentioning any subcommittee, having myself a feeling at that time that it would be better that the committee should sit as a whole, as it did in the Smoot case. On the other hand, since that time I have heard objections to that view, that it would be impossible for them to do so. In looking the matter over I became convinced that probably a smaller committee at some time would be required, so I made that statement on the floor of the Senate; but as for any meeting or even any consultation among the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections as to what they would do, there has been none. No one can say that that committee has made any arrangement of that kind.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has talked about secret arrangements and open arrangements. I want to say to him that I have not made any secret arrangement, and if he made any intimation or insinuation that I have, it was without color of reason or a particle of justification. Every word that has passed between me and other members of the committee, whether Democratic members or Republican members, in respect to this matter has been open to all ears that would listen. I have told every Democrat with whom I have had an opportunity to talk my opinion as to the matter, and there has been no secret about it. There has been no reason for secrecy. There was a considerable demand for a smaller committee, and I expressed the opinion that that would be the result. I expressed that opinion after talking with members of the committee, and I am of that opinion now. I have not hesitated to express that opinion openly to anybody; and if I had had occasion to talk to the Senator from Wisconsin on the subject I would have told it to him as freely, or more freely, than I would to most Senators here, because he was more interested in the subject than most Senators. Every Member perhaps on the Democratic side has heard all that I know of the matter. I may not have talked to every one, but to all with whom I have spoken I have expressed the same opinion. I repeat there has been no secrecy and there has been no occasion for any secrecy. Everything has been open and aboveboard. I had expressed the opinion that there would be a smaller committee designated, that it would have to be reported to the Senate, and when the names came in, if the Senate did not like the names, the Senate could reject them.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. BROWN. I am very anxious to understand the idea in the Senator's mind. His resolution provides for an investigation, and instructs a certain committee to make that investigation in banc. That is the language of the resolution. Now, is it the idea of the Senator from Virginia when this resolution passes, if it shall pass, and goes to this special committee, that the committee will proceed to make the investigation according to the terms of that resolution, or does he expect that committee to report back a recommendation for a smaller committee to be authorized to make the investigation?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. As I have explained, this resolution was introduced by me with the full expectation and purpose that the standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, and not a special committee, would undertake the investigation and would sit in banc and do the work.

Mr. BROWN. I understand that was the Senator's original proposition.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. In presenting that idea the argument has been made that the Committee on Privileges and Elections was too large to do the work efficiently, and so many Senators as constitute the full membership of that committee, which is made up of 15 Senators, could not leave Washington at this time.

Mr. BROWN. Now, I want to know what the present idea of the Senator is, and what the committee will do with the resolution if it shall be passed?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Though no agreement has been made with the committee, after talking with members of the committee, I reached the opinion—and having reached it I have expressed it to Senators freely, openly, and publicly—that that committee would find it necessary to name a smaller committee and report accordingly to the Senate, and then the Senate would designate that smaller committee as a special committee of this body to make the investigation.

Mr. BROWN. Then, as a matter of fact, if the Senator will permit me, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was absolutely right when he said that this resolution was being passed without any intention of having it carried out; that, instead of the committee making the investigation in banc, it would report a proposition for the creation of another committee. That seems to be the present idea of the Senator who fathered the resolution which has been offered as a substitute.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think that will be a very wise course for the committee to take.

Mr. BROWN. Then, Mr. President, why not amend the Senator's proposed substitute resolution and have it say on its face just exactly what the Senator expects to happen to it after the committee gets it?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not desire to amend the resolution, because I offered it in this shape and I propose to have the Senate vote on it in this shape. It puts the responsibility on the standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, where it belongs, and if that committee can not perform the duty in accordance with the terms of the resolution it is the responsibility of that committee to report to the Senate accordingly.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia whether, in considering the matter of a smaller committee, the question was discussed as to how the committee should be composed?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It was discussed to the extent that I have insisted in every conversation I have had with every Senator that there must not be on the committee a majority of men who voted before for WILLIAM LORIMER, and I am satisfied that there will not be. If there should be, I do not believe the Senate will or ought to appoint such Members recommended as a special committee. For my own part, I would not expect to vote for such a committee. If the Committee on Privileges and Elections should make a report to the Senate recommending a special committee and naming that special committee, and a majority of those so named had voted for WILLIAM LORIMER at the last session, I would expect to vote against appointing that committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire if it is further understood that there should be four Democrats and four Republicans on the subcommittee that shall be appointed?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There has been no understanding to that effect. There is, however, an expectation on my part that if there are eight members, there will be four who voted for LORIMER and four who either voted against him or did not vote at all.

Mr. BRISTOW. As I understand, then, there is really no difference between the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Wisconsin as to what really is the understanding as to the ultimate end of this resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think there is a very wide difference between the statements I have made and the statements made by the Senator from Wisconsin. He talked about a secret agreement here. There has been no secret agreement; there has been no secrecy. I have talked with Senators, and I have ascertained what their opinions and beliefs on the subject were, and I have given open and public expression to the opinion I have formed after hearing the views of those Senators. That is all there is of it.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is, there is no agreement, but simply an understanding that what has been understood to be an agreement is to be carried out without any agreement having been made?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not going into any metaphysical discussion of any such proposition as that with the Senator from Arkansas. I do not think the conditions in the Senate have gotten to that pass where Senators can not express a purpose and Senators can not believe in that purpose without calling it "an agreement."

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Nebraska will pardon me, I merely want the name of the State corrected. I have not the honor of representing Arkansas, but I have the honor, in part, to represent Kansas.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Kansas allows his imagination to get possession of him and indulges in facetious remarks very often in the Senate. While he is interrupting me, I will call his attention to some innuendoes he cast during the day about agreements between Senators on this side and on the other side particularly in reference to a motion to adjourn. If there was any agreement about the motion to adjourn it was between the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and myself. He asked me to make that motion, and I made it. I had no agreement with any other human being in respect to it. I thought the time had come when we ought to adjourn, and I had a right to make the motion. If Senators did not want to adjourn, they had a right to vote against the motion. I do not think that that properly subjected me to any animadversions of the character indulged in by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say that I did not know it was an animadversion to suggest that he had inherited the leadership of the Senate, or that when he made a suggestion a majority voted with him, and that it was necessary, apparently, for him to make the motion before we could adjourn. I thought I was conferring a great honor upon the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. When I get honors I expect to get them from some other hands. I did not understand that a motion to adjourn constituted leadership in the Senate. The Senator from Wisconsin expressed a desire not to proceed that evening, and I thought it would be exceedingly unreasonable to expect him to proceed then. In a conversation between him and myself he suggested that I move to adjourn, and I did it, and that is all there is to it. My friend, the Senator from Oregon, says to me, very much to my surprise. I can hardly say to my surprise, because I thought everybody was tired, and that the Senate would adopt a motion to adjourn, even if made by your humble servant.

Mr. President, I will not protract my remarks. I regret exceedingly to have felt called upon to detain the Senate under the circumstances, tired as we all are, but I did feel, in view of the——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I understand the Senator from Virginia now, it is his expectation, putting aside all questions of understandings or agreements, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections, if it takes this resolution, will shortly nominate to the Senate a select committee to carry on this investigation, a committee to be commissioned and authorized by the Senate itself. Am I right?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think they are going to do that; but if the Senator has any doubt about it, let him talk to the members of the committee like I did. I do not want to be sponsor for them. I believe they will do that. I have stated it two or three times, and that is all I can say.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Virginia is the author of the resolution we are now considering, and he says it is his expectation that if it is adopted the Committee on Privileges and Elections will shortly nominate to the Senate a select committee, to be thereafter either elected by the Senate or refused by the Senate. The resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin is that we now nominate and elect a select committee.

In what respect does the resolution of the Senator from Virginia, therefore, differ in principle from the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not going to prolong my occupancy of the floor by going into a discussion of that. That is as apparent to the Senator from Iowa as it is to me. The resolutions speak for themselves. My resolution directs the Committee on Privileges and Elections to make this investigation. If the Senate passes it, the responsibility will be up to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have expressed the opinion that that committee would find it necessary to name a special committee. It can not name a special committee except by the concurrence of the Senate. It will be a committee of the Senate when created, and when they do report a special committee, in case they do, if the personnel is not satisfactory to the Senate, the Senate can correct that personnel. That is all I desire to say. That is all there is to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. So that in the end the Senator from Virginia expects the Senate to elect the special committee?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senate will certainly have to approve the recommendation or substitute some other names. You can not create a special committee except by the action of the Senate. The action of the Senate created the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and it must create any special committee that is raised.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. For a question; not for a speech.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The resolution introduced by the Senator from Virginia authorizes the Committee on Privileges and Elections sitting in banc to conduct this investigation. Now, I understand that the Senator, even if this resolution should be adopted, does not expect it to be carried out. I will ask the Senator what is his object in submitting this resolution to the Senate if he expects it to be ignored after it is adopted?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have explained that so often that the Senator will have to reason it out for himself. I can not go through it again.

Mr. President, I am sorry to have detained the Senate so long.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words before this vote is taken.

Mr. President, at the last session of Congress I voted for the resolution which declared in effect that Mr. LORIMER was fraudulently elected to the Senate and was not entitled to the seat he occupied. Before casting that vote I examined the testimony taken by the Committee on Privileges and Elections with such thoroughness as I was capable of. I read every word of that testimony, and read the material parts of it more than once. I was familiar with the record as it was then made up. I came to the conclusion that Mr. LORIMER'S election was not honestly secured, and accordingly I voted to unseat him. I cast that vote under a profound conviction that I was doing right. Nothing coming to my knowledge has since occurred to shake my faith in the accuracy of that judgment or the righteousness of that vote. There has not been a day since that vote was cast that I would not have been willing to vote to reopen the case, if it could have been properly done, for I did not, and do not, think the case was rightly determined. Of course, I recognize that where the claim or title of a citizen to anything of value is disputed there must come a time when controversy over that title must be composed and finally settled; and yet, Mr. President, if a motion to reopen and retry that case could have been entertained under the law governing this body, I would not have hesitated to support it. Whatever might have been said heretofore about reopening the case, the time has now come when that motion can be lawfully and properly made. When the State senate of Illinois entered upon the investigation with which the Senate and the country are familiar and developed a mass of new and important testimony I felt that the time had come when the Senate, with the utmost propriety and within the strictest letter of the law, not only might reopen the case for a new investigation, but that the time had come when the Senate stood face to face with the imperative and unescapable duty of reopening it. Moreover, Mr. President, I express it as my confident belief that there is not a Senator here on either side of this Chamber who does not feel exactly as I do about this matter. Since the Illinois State senate concluded and reported upon its inquiry there is not a Senator here who does not favor reopening the case for a more thorough investigation by this body. There has never been the least occasion—and now I speak with the utmost deliberation—for any argument of any kind, brief or extended, to be made here to convince the Senate or any Senator that a new investigation should be made. Every moment consumed in that behalf has been a moment wasted—at least wasted so far as any useful purpose here is concerned, although it may have been profitably spent if posing in other fields was the chief end to be promoted. Mr. President, there has been a great deal of politics, and to my thinking very small politics, introduced into the consideration of this matter. I am free to say that I feel a sense of profound indignation, yes, even of contempt, for many things that have been going on here since this session began about this Lorimer case. This is not the sort of business into which small politics should be introduced. While the public right and interest require that we should proceed with due expedition, we should also proceed in a spirit of fairness and with becoming dignity. Where the honor of a man or the good name of a State is involved mere theatrical politics should be eschewed.

Mr. President, as for myself I need no additional inculpatory evidence to determine my judgment as to LORIMER'S guilt of the charge against him. If this case should be or could be again brought before the Senate on the same record we had before, I would vote again as I voted before. I need no additional inculpatory testimony to determine my course or to establish my judgment. If the committee which will make the investigation we are about to order shall return additional incriminating testimony, it will tend only to confirm the opinion I have already deliberately formed and expressed. If there is any exculpatory testimony to be found, I will welcome it. No man would rejoice more than I if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] or his friends in Illinois can produce facts—real facts, about which there can be no question—showing that he is innocent of the dishonoring charge made against him. No man, I say, would welcome that kind of testimony with more pleasure than I. I would not have such a heart as should throb in the breast of a real man if I would not rejoice to see Mr. LORIMER prove himself innocent of the charge against him. I fear that proof can not be made, but if it can be made, then, as God is my judge, I hope it will be made, for his sake, for the sake of our country, and especially for the honor and good name of the great State of Illinois. I have no malice or feeling of hostility against Mr. LORIMER. I can not rejoice over the fall of any man. A ruin of that kind is always a pitiful spectacle. I am unspeakably sorry that this shameful tragedy has occurred.

Mr. President, I have not cared much about the personnel of the committee that is to carry on this investigation. To be sure, I want a fair and representative committee, and a committee that will go to the bottom of the inquiry and ascertain all the facts. If there was, as I believe there was, base corruption in that election, I want to see it exposed. I want it written, as it were, upon a scroll blazoned on the sky that every man may read. But the mere personnel of the committee is a matter, to my thinking, of minor consequence. All we should want is a representative committee, fair to LORIMER, fair to the Senate, fair to the country, and which will proceed promptly to discharge its duty thoroughly and justly. I have heard Senators say there are two questions before us—one as to whether the investigation shall be ordered and the other as to what particular agency shall be employed to make it. As to the first of these there is absolutely no difference of opinion. The investigation is as good as ordered already, and it will be ordered by a practically unanimous vote. I have not heard a Senator say anything to the contrary. I have not heard an expression that was not pronouncedly in favor of the investigation, and no one else has heard anything of a different kind. It has gone through this Chamber in such a way that every man knows—must know if he does not shut his ears and eyes and if all his senses are not dead—that it is the fixed purpose of the Senate to order this investigation. That question is already settled. It was settled from the beginning. The only thing we have to deal with, therefore, relates to the committee to be selected to execute the order of the Senate. I have already said I regard that as a matter of comparatively minor importance. That is a question we should have settled long ago and settled within an hour. I can not conceive it to be possible that the Senate could send out a committee on this mission that would not honorably discharge the duty devolved upon it. Mr. President, I have heard utterances here to-day that have stirred the very depths of my indignation—utterances impugning the integrity and honor of the Senate. I do not believe that the Senate of the United States is made up of dishonorable men. A charge of that kind—even an insinuation to that effect, however covertly made—is wanton, unwarranted, and unworthy. A dishonest man may find his way into the Senate, as he may into the church or into any organized body, but I believe that sort of thing to be rare and exceptional. I do not believe that the Senate of the United States deserves to be spoken of on this floor or elsewhere in such terms of opprobrium and reproach as imputes a lack of integrity in its membership. Why, sir, are the Senators who surround me while I speak dishonest men? Sitting here three feet in front of me is the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], if he will pardon me for so pointedly mentioning his name in this connection. Does any man question that this Senator or that either of the Senators from Oregon is an honorable and high-minded public servant? I see here at my side the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], and a little farther away I see his colleague [Mr. KERN]. Are not these honorable men and faithful representatives? What would the people of Indiana say to that? And what do the people of the other States say as to the personal integrity of the men they have commissioned to this great assembly? The people of each State personally know the men they send to the Senate, and the voters, no matter which party is in the ascendancy, will not elect any man to the Senate they do not believe to be honest; and in this respect I believe the people of all the States and all the parties are alike. A bad man may find his way into the Senate, or a man may become bad after he gets to the Senate, but such cases are, as I have said, rare and exceptional. The Senate as a body is composed, and always has been composed, of honorable and high-minded men. I will not stand on this floor and seek to put upon the American Senate the brand of dishonor. These Senators around me here are not men so dishonest, unfaithful, and unpatriotic that they should be scourged from this floor as were the money changers from the temple. For myself I have faith in the patriotism and honor of the American Senate and in the personnel and official integrity of American Senators. Evils exist undoubtedly—evils that cry aloud for remedies. The Senate is largely responsible for these evils, and it is slow in granting relief; but these evils are chiefly the outgrowth of bad economic systems and policies and not of official dishonesty and betrayal by individual Senators.

Mr. President, when we first began to consider the appointment of this investigating committee I myself thought it would be better to appoint a special committee composed of Senators sworn in at the beginning of this session. This was not because I had any doubt about the integrity of the standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which such matters are ordinarily referred, but because I felt that it would be in some respects better to send out a committee composed of men who had not expressed—at least officially expressed—any opinion on the case. I did not deem that to be of vital importance, however, although I was rather strongly inclined to that view as being perhaps the most satisfactory solution of the committeeship question. Another suggestion I heard made I thought equally as good, namely, that the committee should be composed in part of Senators who had voted for LORIMER at the former hearing and in part of Senators who voted against him, dividing them equally. In fact, Mr. President, I have always been ready to accept any committee so constituted as to command respect and confidence and that had nothing sinister in appearance. This matter ought to have been easily and satisfactorily disposed of without controversy. It is not a seemly thing to see the Senate wrangling over the personnel of a committee chosen for a work of this character. In a matter of this kind I act not as a partisan but as a judge. I do not like the notion of organizing a committee like this with any thought of securing an advantage one way or the other. All I want—and all any of us should want—is a committee that will go out and get the testimony and report it back as speedily as possible, so that we may take up this case and finally dispose of it. Mr. President, there is no good sense in this controversy. We are simply making much out of nothing, or next to nothing. The question which has been raised here, involving a want of confidence in the Committee on Privileges and Elections, ought never to have been raised. It is most unfortunate. But that question has been raised, and it has been emphasized with blunt directness in speeches made here to-day. I had not intended to say a word about this matter until these utterances here this afternoon. But now I feel constrained to say that I am unwilling to cast a vote that in itself would be an expression of a want of confidence in the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I will not do it, because I have confidence in the committee. There are too many high-minded and honorable men on that committee to cast such a reflection upon them. The utterances to which we have listened here to-day can only be interpreted as a reproach of that committee—not only a reproach, but an expression of absolute want of confidence in the integrity of the committee. I think these utterances were altogether ill timed, unfortunate, and undeserved, and I am unwilling to cast any vote that would appear to be in approval of them.

I had nothing to do with the introduction of the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I was not consulted about it. I knew of it only when it was presented and read to this body. I was not at the time altogether satisfied with the form of the resolution, and after it was offered and the matter had taken that shape I would have preferred to send the whole matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections with instructions to report back to the Senate such recommendation as the committee thought proper and expedient. I thought by doing that the Senate would still retain full control of the matter, and I thought that that disposition of the matter would be satisfactory to everybody. I prepared a resolution to that effect, and consulted with several Senators about offering it, but most of them thought it better to leave the matter as it was, rather than add to the confusion by another resolution, and so I did not offer it. I yielded to the judgment of those who had given more attention to the subject than I, and besides I did not consider it of great importance whether the matter should be disposed of in the one way or the other.

Now, sir, it is said there is an agreement or understanding, expressed or implied, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections will not make the investigation, but will report back recommending the appointment of a special committee of eight Senators, to be selected from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, four to be Senators who voted for LORIMER on the former hearing and four to be Senators who voted against him or of new Senators who have not voted at all. Senators who are dissatisfied with anything and everything they do not themselves propose have spoken in disparagement of that agreement. Suppose there is such an agreement, what of it? Is it not an agreement in the interest of justice, right, and fair play? For myself I do not want a committee having a majority of men who voted for LORIMER three months ago; neither do I want a committee having a majority of men who voted against him. I do not want a committee so constituted that a majority of its members would start upon this investigation with fixed impressions, already officially expressed, that LORIMER is either guilty or innocent. I want neither the one nor the other. I want a committee that will be as nearly representative and impartial as it is possible to be made. Does any Senator desire any other kind of committee? Would not a committee made up of eight Senators, four of whom voted for LORIMER and four of whom voted against him or did not vote at all, be a fair and representative committee? Do you want something that is not fair, honorable, and right? Do you want a committee to start out with the case prejudged? Senators, we are dealing with a grave question, one that involves even more than the life of a man, for it involves his honor, as well as the good name of a great State. We should proceed in such a way that it can never be said that we forgot or ignored the rules of fair dealing among men. I repeat, I want a committee made up of fair men—an impartial and representative committee—and I want nothing else. A committee of that kind can be made up in more ways than one. A committee made up of new Senators, who have not voted or spoken at all, would be a fair committee, and, as I have said, I felt inclined at the beginning, and until these new and most unfortunate collateral issues were injected, to favor a committee of that kind. But, Mr. President, when Senators rise here and undertake to say, whether directly or by insinuation, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections is not entitled to the confidence and respect of the Senate, I will not cast a vote that would seem to sanction or give countenance to that assault. I am content to send this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I had rather send it there than to cast any reflection on the committee. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the chairman of the committee, is an honorable man, and I have faith that he will carry out any understanding he has with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. If it is understood, as I have been assured it is understood, that a special committee of eight Senators is to be recommended, and to be constituted in the way I have indicated, I am satisfied. I can see no possible objection to that. It would be in all respects a fair committee, and that is enough. I do not care to waste time in quarreling over indifferent and immaterial things. It is results I am looking for, and if the final outcome is satisfactory I am content. No man under the dome which spans the universe can say that a committee composed of four men who voted for LORIMER and four who voted against him or did not vote at all is not a fair committee. Any man who would say anything else is not a fair man, and his opinion would be of no consequence to me.

Mr. President, I am going to vote for the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia. I am going to vote for it in the faith and with the understanding that the Committee on Privileges and Elections, being practically unable, acting as a whole, to carry on the investigation, will report a recommendation for the appointment of a special committee, composed as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has indicated. The arrangement is an honorable and proper one, and I expect it to be carried out. The Committee on Privileges and Elections is composed of honorable men; they will do what they ought to do, and I am willing to trust them.

Mr. President, there is another reason why I shall support the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia, and that is a reason that should strongly appeal to every Democratic Senator. The Senator from Virginia is the chairman of the Democratic caucus, and is therefore ex officio our titular leader. We also have a steering committee, of which the Senator from Virginia is also ex officio the chairman. This steering committee represents the official organization of the Senate Democracy. Because of the complications that have arisen here about this investigation the Democratic steering committee saw proper, and I think wisely, to take up the subject and consider it. It was not the purpose of the steering committee to give to this subject a partisan aspect, for it is a subject which can not be honorably considered in a partisan way, but for the purpose of bringing the Democratic minority, which now comprises nearly one-half the Senate, to such a consideration of the subject as would aid in securing a just and fair determination of it. As a result of that conference of the steering committee the Senator from Virginia offered the resolution now pending before the Senate. Moreover, a conference of all Democratic Senators was called to consider this matter, and that conference determined that the resolution of the Senator from Virginia should be supported, provided that an arrangement could be made or an understanding had that a fair and impartial special committee—one that would challenge universal commendation—should finally be appointed. I am not a member of the steering committee and I did not attend the party caucus or conference to which I have referred, but I state the case as it has been reported to me. I do know that a second or subsequent conference was called and held, which I did attend, and I do know that the final action of that conference was in accord with the action taken by the previous conference. Mr. President, I am a Democrat and a party man. I am an organization Democrat, not a disorganizer. I believe in party organization, for if we have no parties I know of no means or agency through which men having the same views, or substantially the same views, on great and vital public questions can work together and cooperate so as to make their efforts effective. I want to see the Democrats of the Senate stand together. The Democrats of the House have set us a most inspiring example in this regard—an example we would do well and wisely to follow. I do not want to see the Democrats of the Senate break up into factions and tear at each others' throats, particularly over comparatively indifferent and immaterial things. I appeal to you, my Democratic friends, to stand by our own organization and support its recommendations, and especially so when its recommendations do not involve any vital and far-reaching question against which your conscience makes a protest. If we would maintain an effective organization, we can not afford to be individually dogmatic and refuse to cooperate with our party unless we can have our own individual way. That would be the policy of rule or ruin and would be absolutely destructive of party organization and all hope of party cohesion. We must have some regard for the views and sentiments of each other and strive to reach a common ground of agreement. To that end we should be willing to make reasonable concessions, and cheerfully make them, whenever concessions do not involve a vital principle which deeply concerns the public welfare. We should remember that the only well-grounded hope we can have of working effectively to accomplish ends is by cooperation through our party agencies. If we split into factions and war against each other about every little thing that comes along we will dissipate our opportunities and accomplish nothing of practical value. My party organization having determined upon the course outlined by our floor leader, the Senator from Virginia, I shall support it, confident in the belief that a satisfactory result will be achieved. Others may do as they please, but, as for me, I shall stand by my own flag and follow my own party leadership in preference to standing under some other flag and following some other leadership.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has talked much to-day, as he often does, about the bad things going on in the country. He denounced with his usual vehemence the trusts and great combines, and cried out for reform in the prevailing economic conditions, which he declares are injuring the country and the people. In the main I agree with him about all that. We Democrats have been saying substantially the same things and crying aloud for substantially the same reforms for lo! these many days. For years we have denounced the very things the honorable Senator so eloquently denounces and about which he becomes so righteously indignant. The trouble about the Senator from Wisconsin and his immediate associates is that they content themselves with denunciatory oratorical outbursts and fruitless declamations. If they mean business why do not they come over into the Democratic Party, which is a great and powerful organization, and help us accomplish at least some of the things that ought to be accomplished; but they will not come to us nor lend us any effective aid. Instead of doing that, these 12 or 13 Senators, banded together in a little alliance of so-called progressive Republicans, stand aloof and content themselves with hurling philippics and jeremiads in the face of the majority—the controlling and dominating majority—of their own party. If they mean business why do they not come with us and go with us to accomplish results? They break away from their own party, but they refuse to join their efforts with ours. The reciprocity bill is now before the Finance Committee and I hope will soon be before the Senate. We also have the so-called farmers' free list before the Finance Committee, and in a few days the Democratic House will send over to the Senate a revision of the woolen schedule, and a little later will send other bills revising the cotton schedule and the steel schedule. The Senator from Wisconsin is a member of the Committee on Finance. Will he help us to put these bills, or any of them, through the Finance Committee? Will he or his associates help us to pass any of these bills when the committee reports them to the Senate? I venture the doleful prophecy that they will not. They stand on this floor and shout voluble, vigorous, and vehement denunciations against the iniquities of our high-protection laws, and in doing that they do splendidly and talk like Democrats; but when it comes to doing real, practical things they not only turn their backs on the high protectionists of their party, but they refuse to affiliate or cooperate with Democrats in the work of amending the tariff laws and bringing about the reforms they clamor for. They simply stand off by themselves and talk. For myself I want these gentlemen to be one thing or another—"to fish or cut bait." I confess to a growing feeling of weariness over this thing of men denouncing everything and everybody, but when it comes to doing something practical they throw their opportunities away and vanish. I am growing weary of the habit these distinguished Senators have fallen into of telling us Democrats that they will work with us if we will permit them to arrange the whole program and assume the undisputed leadership, and will work with us in no other way. They declare that the high-protection policy of the Republican Party furnishes an opportunity for commercial pirates to carry on, under color of law, a refined species of grand larceny, and they are right in that. They say they stand for lowering the customs duties and for revising the tariff downward. Just how much they would lower the rates or just how far downward they would revise the tariff I do not know, and they do not tell us. They will not act with us nor yet tell us frankly just what they want. All we know is that they are equally opposed to a protective tariff and a revenue tariff. They denounce the present rates as too high, but how much lower they would consent to make the rates they do not deign to advise us. Is it possible that they are opposed to grand larceny, but look with complaisance on petit larceny? I am against larceny of either kind. I am opposed to plundering the people either in a large way or a smaller way. I am for a revenue tariff—that is, a tariff no higher than is necessary to raise needed revenue for the support of the Government. When these bills are brought before the Senate I shall strive to develop the attitude of this small heroic band of so-called progressive Republicans. I am going to try to find out whether they will pull with us or whether they will pull off and say, "No; we can not go with you, nor can we go with the regulars of our own party, but we would like to have you Democrats come over and put yourselves under our tutelage and guardianship." I shall also be curious to observe what effect that kind of appeal will have on Senators on this side of the Chamber. I am apprehensive that these insurgents over there are ambitious to inoculate this side of the Chamber with that spirit of factionalism which so distinguishes the other side. It would really be a fine achievement if they could decoy a lot of Democratic Senators into their camp and teach them the art and inspire them with a passion for destroying effective party organization.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Can the Senator from Missouri inform us how the Democrats stand as to unanimity on the reciprocity agreement?

Mr. STONE. I think most of them are for it. It is possible that a small minority are against it.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I should like to volunteer to the Senator from Idaho the information that when we get to the woolen schedule, which is a real party test, we will all vote the same way.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. So will we.

Mr. STONE. Yes; so you will [laughter]; you will all vote against it.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to see the credentials of the Senator who says they will all vote together on that side.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I volunteered the suggestion, and stand by it.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not ask for the identity; I asked for the credentials.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not ask for any credentials on that side.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STONE. As long as the Senator desires.

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to ask the Senator from Texas if that includes Mr. Bryan?

Mr. BAILEY. As Mr. Bryan is not a Member of the Senate, it was not necessary to include him.

Mr. BORAH. I am not sure that Mr. Bryan is not effectively a Member of Congress, and he is certainly a large part of the party.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sure he is not legally a Member. It is not proper to refer in this body to what transpires in the House of Representatives, but I think the Senator from Idaho will find that the woolen schedule will not be made according to Mr. Bryan's views, and I am indulging the hope that it will be so made that the Senator from Idaho will vote for it. Can he comfort me by an assurance on that point?

Mr. BORAH. I am unable to extend the comfort until I see the schedule.

Mr. BAILEY. It will be better than the existing law, which so many of your own party have denounced.

Mr. BORAH. The conditions which confront our friends on the other side of the Chamber are not so specific or so certain as to enable us to know just where we are going in case of a desire to go with you.

Mr. BAILEY. I will tell the Senator from Idaho what I will agree to do. If we can not pass our bill and he will write one better than the existing law, and then give us enough insurgent votes to pass it, we will vote for it. Will the Senator agree to that proposition?

Mr. BORAH. I might agree to that; but the thing I am most interested in is to discover the extent of the harmony which is being discussed upon the Democratic side this afternoon.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Idaho seems to be more interested in the question of harmony on this side than in the passage of legislation for the relief of the people. I am not surprised at the Senator's absorbing interest in Democratic harmony.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we have had considerable difficulty over here because of the lack of harmony, and, as we are invited over on the Democratic side, we want to be sure that we do not jump from the frying pan into the fire.

Mr. STONE. Well, some of you are striving to create the same state of inharmony on this side that you have over there, and that seems to be your chief interest in the Democratic Party. When it comes to kicking up a row, I invite you to stay on your own reservation. I want the Democrats in this Senate to stand together as a solid, cohesive, aggressive body, instead of permitting themselves to be misled by influences that are not intended for the promotion of Democratic success.

Mr. BORAH. That would be an extraordinary and comforting position for our Democratic friends to occupy, even for a short time.

Mr. STONE. You mean harmony?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; harmony.

Mr. STONE. I think we are reasonably harmonious.

Mr. BORAH. I think it is true that the Senator from Missouri holds the harp, but I doubt if the others are dancing to the tune.

Mr. STONE. As to that we can only wait and see.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho is willing to wait.

Mr. STONE. I am not prophesying, but I invite the Senator to be patient.

Mr. BORAH. But we do not want this invitation urged too much until the harmony is established.

Mr. STONE. We will let the invitation stand, although we are without much hope of its acceptance under any circumstances.

Mr. President, I do not think I care to add anything further to what I have said. I shall vote for the Martin resolution, because I believe—yes; because I have the utmost confidence—that a result will be worked out under that resolution that will be satisfactory to every man who asks only for fair play. That is all I care to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the substitute submitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] for the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say, Mr. President, that this is an important vote. I am going to vote for the resolution of the Senator from Virginia because it provides that the Committee on Privileges and Elections shall sit together and try this case. I hope they will sit in Washington and summon witnesses here, where, if they refuse to produce their books or refuse to testify, they can be tried under contempt proceedings by this body. In that respect, I think, the resolution is stronger, more far-reaching, and meritorious than the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin, and I am going to vote for it. The committee are all honorable, high-minded men, and the resolution especially directs an inquiry into the collateral questions not specifically enjoined on the first investigation, and I have no doubt the work will be well done and that the whole truth will be ascertained for our guidance. We do not ask for the rule of law applicable in such cases; we ask for the facts, and we will supply the rules of law in our final consideration of the entire subject when a report shall reach the Senate. I disagreed with the committee before on the rule to be applied, and reserve the right to do so again if, in my judgment, that course seems necessary or wise in order to reach a just and honest verdict.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when Mr. BRYAN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. BRYAN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of serious illness in his family.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], but I have been released from that pair upon this question and upon all others growing out of it. I shall therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], but I have a letter from that Senator authorizing me to disregard my pair in this case for reasons specified by him in the letter. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). On this proposition I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER]. If he were present, he would vote "yea," while I would vote "nay." Being paired with him, I refrain from voting.

Mr. BACON (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). I was requested by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who has left the city, to announce that he has arranged a pair on this question with the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. If he were present, the Senator from New York would vote "yea," and the Senator from California will doubtless announce as to his own vote.

Mr. STONE (when Mr. REED's name was called). My colleague [Mr. REED] was called unexpectedly from the city and we have not been able to arrange a pair for him. If he were present, I am authorized to say that he would vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] on this question is paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If he were present and free to vote, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], and has asked me to make that announcement.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia (when Mr. SWANSON's name was called). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. If he were present, the junior Senator from Virginia would vote "yea."

Mr. FOSTER (when Mr. THORNTON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. THORNTON] is unavoidably absent on public business. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. WARREN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON]. My colleague if present would vote "yea." He desired me to make that announcement.

Mr. WORKS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present the Senator from New York would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). Mr. President, before the vote is announced I desire to say that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. As I have voted I think it proper to say that I have done so in accordance with his permission.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I am just advised that he has not voted, and I therefore withdraw my vote. I understand that if the junior Senator from Pennsylvania were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. GORE (after having voted in the negative). I am advised that the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is absent from the city. I have a pair with him upon this vote. If he were present he would vote "yea." I have voted "nay," but on account of the pair I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I did not understand whether the Senator from Virginia announced that his colleague [Mr. SWANSON] would have voted "yea" or "nay."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The junior Senator from Virginia, if present, would have voted "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understood the senior Senator from Virginia to say that the junior Senator from Virginia was paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. The junior Senator from Michigan is not present, being unavoidably absent, and, as I have announced, if present he would have voted "yea"; so that the pair does not stand, as I understand.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Both are absent and it does not affect the vote.

The result was announced—yeas 48, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—48.

Mr. STONE. But I very much object to it. We ought to go on and do some business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the motion?

And whereas by the death of the Hon. Joel Cook, who was elected to represent the second congressional district, composed of the eighth, ninth, tenth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, twentieth, and thirty-seventh wards of the city of Philadelphia, in the House of Representatives of the United States, a vacancy now exists in said district for the Sixty-second Congress;

Joel Cook, deceased, was elected in the Sixty-second Congress.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State, at the city of Harrisburg, this 27th day of May, A. D. 1911, and of the Commonwealth the one hundred and thirty-fifth.

[SEAL.] JOHN K. TENER.

By the governor:

ROBERT MCAFEE,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I present Mr. REYBURN to be sworn in.

The SPEAKER administered the oath of office to Mr. REYBURN.

UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 186.

Resolved, That AUGUSTUS P. GARDNER be, and is hereby, elected a member of the select committee provided for in House resolution 148 in place of MARLIN E. OLMSTED, resigned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes, for the purpose of making a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes to make a brief statement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday a Democratic caucus was held, which gave its approval to a bill shortly to be introduced, revising Schedule K of the existing tariff law. During the caucus proceedings considerable discussion was had as to the necessity of laying a tariff upon raw wool for revenue purposes. During the day, and prior to action upon the bill by the caucus, a resolution was adopted, which the morning newspapers failed to carry in their report of the caucus proceedings, and I ask that the resolution be read in my time, in order that all of the facts may be known in connection with the approval that was given the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says he desires that all of the facts be known. Can he put in the rest of the proceedings of the caucus?

Mr. BURLESON. The proceedings, with the exception of this resolution, were substantially carried by the newspapers this morning.

Mr. MANN. But not in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the reading of the resolution referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Were the speeches that were delivered here yesterday and last night made a part of the RECORD also?

Mr. BURLESON. There was no stenographic report of the speeches, but not a speech delivered during the day would have given any comfort to the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. How about the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman expect the adoption of this resolution without discussion?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no; I am not asking the House to take action on the resolution. I simply ask that it be read in order that its contents may be made public and that the country may know exactly what took place.

Mr. HILL. Then it is not understood that in not declining to allow the resolution to be read and put into the RECORD, those who do not decline assent to the principles involved?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, the resolution states only the truth—the straightforward, God's honest truth.

Mr. HILL. That is a matter of opinion that might be decided after argument, but the question I asked was whether we are to be allowed to discuss the proposition or whether we are to accept it?

Mr. BURLESON. You will be given full opportunity to discuss it when the gentleman from Alabama presents the bill revising Schedule K. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. But no opportunity will be given now?

Mr. BURLESON. You can, so far as I am concerned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill revising Schedule K, as presented to this caucus by the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, is not to be construed as an abandonment of any Democratic policy—

[Applause on the Republican side.]

but in view of the Democratic platform demand for a "gradual reduction" of the tariff, and of the depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury—

a result of Republican extravagance—

a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool is now proposed as a revenue necessity.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Was it stated in that meeting yesterday that there is now a surplus for this fiscal year of from $3,000,000 to $4,000,000 in the Treasury?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not recall that any statement of that character was made.

Mr. PAYNE. Was a statement made that the Treasury was $20,000,000 better off to-day, or, rather, the 31st day of May——

Mr. BURLESON. No.

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). Than it was a year ago?

Mr. BURLESON. No; there was not a single erroneous statement made during the entire caucus proceeding. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, in that connection, I ask unanimous consent to print the Treasury statement of May 31, in order that the gentlemen on the other side may have exactly the official information which I was trying to give the gentleman from Texas by a question, but it appears he would not accept it——

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I join in the request in order that the statement of the gentleman from New York may be thoroughly refuted.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to get that consent, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York will suspend, the Chair will endeavor to get the consent. Is there objection to the publication of the statement which the gentleman from New York mentioned? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The statement follows.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARNER. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that his time may be extended for five minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. Oh, ha, ha, ha.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, did any gentleman rise in his place and object?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was standing in the aisle when he objected.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO FILL VACANCIES ON COMMITTEES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there are vacancies on three standing committees of the House caused by the resignation of Members. I move the election of Hon. ROBERT E. DIFENDERFER, of Pennsylvania, to a vacancy now existing on the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. Also the election of Hon. CHARLES F. BOOHER, of Missouri, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department. Also the election of the Hon SAMUEL A. WITHERSPOON, of Mississippi, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the motion reported from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. ROBERT E. DIFENDERFER, of Pennsylvania, nominated by the committee on committees——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I did not write the motion out. I just sent the names up there. The gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. I do not ask the gentleman from Alabama to write the motion out.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. ROBERT E. DIFENDERFER, of Pennsylvania, to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

Hon. CHARLES F. BOOHER, of Missouri, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

Hon. SAMUEL A. WITHERSPOON, of Mississippi, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the Clerk started to read something as to the recommendation of the committee on committees. I suppose that as a member of the Ways and Means Committee I am a member of the committee on committees. I am not aware that that committee has been called together to make a recommendation.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman is awfully mistaken about that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that he is still working under the czar rule on that side.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the only mistake the gentleman made was that he supposed before the session commenced, and has since, that the entire rules and legislation of the House were settled upon in caucus, and not in the House itself.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I will say that Mr. DIFENDERFER, who is assigned to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, takes the position vacated by Mr. BOOHER, and I would like to be informed what position Mr. DIFENDERFER will be accorded on that committee.

The SPEAKER. He will go to the foot of the Democratic contingent on that committee.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. HAMMOND, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. BORLAND, for two weeks, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TUESDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until Tuesday next.

Mr. MANN. Tuesday is unanimous-consent day and committee-discharge day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the motion is not debatable.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for one minute.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman really wants to discuss this question, I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 10 minutes, and that I may have a like amount of time.

Mr. MANN. I do not want more than one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] have 10 minutes in which to discuss the motion.

Mr. MANN. I only asked one minute.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will couple with that the request that I have 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have 1 minute and that he himself have 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I object to that. I am in favor of the gentleman's original proposition for 10 minutes on a side.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has the unanimous consent carried, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. JAMES. It was objected to by the gentleman from New York over the protest of the minority leader.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, next Monday, if the House met, would be Unanimous Consent Calendar day, Suspension Calendar day, and Committee Discharge Calendar day. There are a number of bills upon the Committee Discharge Calendar, such as the pension bill, a bill providing for the physical valuation of railroads, and a large number of others, which might just as well be considered by the House while it is waiting for the final adjournment and waiting on other business. It seems to me that with the committees appointed in the House ready to do work, if they are willing to work, it is right and proper that the House take up these matters on Monday and determine whether the House will proceed to their consideration if the committees will not discharge the duties for which they are appointed, but sit idle and do nothing. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] if it prevails, will carry over this discharge day. We have heard a good deal in the country about the desirability of giving the House the right to discharge committees which will not consider bills, and yet when we are met with the actual proposition that side of the House is afraid to meet the issue. It is all very well for them to say that the caucus of their party has determined not to act, but we are met now with this proposition, for example: On the Panama Canal it is absolutely necessary that we fix the tolls that shall be charged for the use of the canal when it shall have been opened. And yet we have here a majority declining, so far, to do anything, although I hope on that matter they will change their opinion.

Let us have a meeting on Monday and say whether we are willing to go ahead and transact other business while we are waiting upon the distinguished gentleman from Alabama and his committee to report these tariff bills. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, when I hear the pathetic plea of the gentleman from Illinois I hark back to the time when the Hon. Thomas B. Reed sat in that chair and the Dingley bill was under consideration, when for four long months he refused to appoint a committee of this House because, he said—not the House, but he said—that this Congress should transact no business except the enactment of the tariff bill. I remember at that time——

Mr. HINDS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; excuse me. The Hon. Jerry Simpson, of Kansas, occupying a position corresponding to that of my friend from Illinois, would rise in his seat on every day, almost, and ask the distinguished Speaker of the House when he intended to appoint the committees and let the House transact business. I remember when the Payne bill was before this House it was stated by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that the session was a tariff session, and that we were here to enact only tariff legislation and that no other legislation should be considered by this House. We have Republican precedents if we wanted to prohibit legislation. But we do not. Instead of asking the Speaker of this House to act the part of a czar and refuse to appoint committees of the House we have carried the matter before the caucus of the responsible majority of this House, and they have outlined a program of legislation for this Congress at this extra session—a program that has met with the approval of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have not prohibited all legislation. We have passed a bill compelling publicity of campaign contributions before elections that you refused to do.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we passed it at the last Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, not requiring publicity of contributions before elections.

Mr. MANN. Yes; we did. In the House we passed it in that way.

Mr. BURLESON. But your party failed to enact it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Your party failed to pass it, and if it fails now it will be because of your party and not ours.

Mr. MANN. That is another question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We have passed on to the United States Senate a bill requiring the election of United States Senators by the people of the United States. We have passed the legislation that a Republican President called us together to enact——

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. So did we——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Legislation which your party in another branch of Congress, at the other end of the Capitol, to this day has not even reported to the Senate of the United States. We are here to carry out our legislative program. The country did not want us to stay here all summer and enact any general legislation, therefore we limited our program to the important questions that the country demanded, including tariff legislation, and it would be a matter of absurdity for us when we had, by the action of the responsible majority of this House, told the chairmen of the great committees of this House that they should not report any bills except the bills agreed upon in our program, to come here and meet, as the gentleman from Illinois wants us to do, and go through the form of defeating motions to discharge committees when the responsible majority of this House has told those committees they should not report the bills.

Now, we do not dodge the issue. The reason the bills are not reported is because we said they should not be reported. In due time, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, those bills will come before the House.

Mr. MANN. There is no time like the present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They will come before the House, not as introduced, but they will come before the House——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the gentleman not to interrupt me. They will come before the House properly considered by the legislative committees of this House, put on the calendar in the regular way, and if they meet with the approval of the majority of this House, they will be enacted into law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Illinois asked us to go through a farce. He knows, and the country knows, why the bills have not been reported, and he knows that if the Committee Discharge Calendar were in order to be considered to-day, in common justice to those committees, in good faith to our position, we would be compelled to defeat the motion to discharge the committees. It is for that reason that we are adjourning over Calendar Monday, so that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] may not attempt to play horse in this House by trying to work the Discharge Calendar, when he knows the great committees of this House have been prohibited from reporting these bills. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this resolution is not debatable.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman has had 10 minutes——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yielded to the minority leader [Mr. MANN] such time as he desired.

Mr. DALZELL. I suggest to the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. This motion is not debatable under the rules, but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] obtained 10 minutes for himself and 1 minute for the gentleman from Illinois, at the request of that gentleman, by unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. DALZELL. If the time of the gentleman from Alabama has not expired, I think he ought to yield to me, to correct a mistaken statement which he made.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman representing the Democratic Party had 10 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], representing the Republican Party on this floor, had the opportunity to use 10 minutes, ought not the third party, represented by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to have 10 minutes also?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman yield now for a minute, to allow me to make a correction?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman says that he desires to have one minute to correct a statement that I made, if I have made any incorrect statement, I am pleased to have the gentleman correct it, and I will ask that the gentleman have one minute.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama has time remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I think that in justice to the memory of Mr. Reed I should make this statement: The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] ascribed to him an assumption of power to refuse to appoint committees. While the Dingley bill was in process of making, and while the House was adjourning three days at a time, as we are adjourning now, Mr. Dingley offered a resolution directing the Speaker to appoint the committees of the House, and that resolution was voted upon, and voted down by a vote of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; after the House had been in session for months. I was here with the gentleman, and I remember very well. We had been in session for months.

Mr. DALZELL. But Mr. Reed was not responsible for that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, Speaker Reed had refused for months to appoint the committees, and then this resolution was offered to protect the Speaker.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a vote.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama allow a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when the question is put, I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The question to be voted on is the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next. On that question the gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. The Chair will count all gentlemen standing.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced 48 in favor of ordering the yeas and nays and 130 in the negative, more than one-fifth in the affirmative—a sufficient number—and that the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 154, noes 67, answered "present" 6, not voting 160, as follows:

Hon. CHARLES G. BENNETT,
Secretary United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed I hand you copy of senate resolution No. 78, adopted by the senate of the State of Illinois, forty-seventh general assembly.

I also inclose a copy of the report made by the special investigating committee in regard to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as United States Senator.

I also hand you a copy of the evidence taken before the investigating committee.

The delay in sending these has been occasioned partly by reason of not getting a copy of the evidence.

Hon. F. E. WARREN, United States Senator:

For the attention of the honorable Members of the United States Senate:

Allow a few moments of your valuable time for the kind consideration of the effects of Canadian reciprocity and the wool tariff question on the stock growers of this section of Wyoming, as seen by one who has resided for the past seven years in the heart of the grazing country.

At no time could we have been so absolutely unprepared for this threatened blow, taking into consideration the disastrous winter of 1909–10, resulting in an incredible loss to the stock grower, the almost complete drought of the summer following, the extremely discouraging prospects of the present spring, both in regard to the dry condition of the range and the exceedingly low prices on wool and live stock, coupled with the fact that during our longest and most trying period of adversity we were either conducting our enterprises at an actual loss or in some of the more favored instances on a basis of being barely able to make expenses, and figuring also the inroads made by the homesteaders upon our range, one will readily understand that at such a critical time, when the actual foundations of our industry seem to have been shaken almost to the point of crumbling, that the introduction of free wool and Canadian reciprocity would be the last straw, as it were, and would result in the complete obliteration of our industry.

It is pitiful in the extreme to witness the discouragement and despair so plainly written on the faces of the stock growers, who have been clinging with doglike tenacity to their means of livelihood during the various reverses of the past two years, making heroic efforts to tide themselves over until such time as an abundant rainfall and better prices might lighten their burdens, and to observe with what despondent countenances they view these impending disasters in the forms of free wool and Canadian reciprocity, seemingly ready to grasp from their unwilling hands the wherewithal by which they hoped to retrench their finances and enable them to again hold up their heads among the confident and prosperous of our country.

On the part of the stock growers of eastern Wyoming, I implore your thorough and careful consideration of these important measures, and feel assured that after the various facts and conditions have been considered, the Members of the United States Senate will hesitate to pass favorably upon bills that without the least doubt will cause such an immense amount of suffering among our people, and no material benefit to any other class, other than foreigners and a favored few in our country who need neither assistance nor protection. We have the same unshaken faith in the wisdom and ability of our Senators that we have had in the past, and are quite positive that after a fair and impartial investigation has been made, and the effects of the Wilson-Gorman bill have been called to mind, our safety will be assured by the intelligent and farseeing disposition of these all-important measures, and a healthful prosperity will once more attend our efforts.

N. KELLY KLODT,
Newcastle, Weston County, Wyo.

Mr. WARREN presented the memorial of R. O. Parrish, of Horse Creek, Wyo., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Bricklayers and Masons' International Union No. 1, of Cheyenne, Wyo., remonstrating against the alleged abduction of John J. McNamara from Indianapolis, Ind., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 2559) for the relief of L. L. Scherer, which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

ADDRESS OF RIGHT HON. SIR CHARLES FITZPATRICK.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent to have published as a public document an address delivered by the Right Hon. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, chief justice of Canada, at the fifth annual banquet of the American Society of International Law in this city on April 29 last. It is an address upon the subjects of peace, international law, and arbitration, the work already done, and the work it is hoped will be done by The Hague Court of Arbitration. (S. Doc. No. 41.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I failed to hear the Senator's request. What is the document?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is that there be printed as a document an address by the Right Hon. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, chief justice of Canada, at the fifth annual banquet of the American Society of International Law, delivered in this city April 29 last.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the subject of it is arbitration, peace, and The Hague court, the work The Hague court has done, and the work it is hoped it will do.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator what is the object. Is it for the purpose of printing it as a public document for general distribution through the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I thought that it would be well to put the usual number at the disposal of Senators in order that this work might be understood, that what has been accomplished at The Hague might become the public property of the people of the United States as far as this could make it so, and that the general cause of peace and arbitration might be advanced and furthered.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the printing of it now as a public document is concerned, I shall not object, but I want to say to the Senator that if hereafter a request comes here for printing ten or twenty or thirty thousand copies, to be distributed from some central point, I certainly shall object to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My request now is for the printing of the usual number; whatever it is I do not know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No objection is heard, and the order will be entered.

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT TAFT.

Mr. DU PONT. I have a copy of the address of President Taft before the Western Economic Society, delivered in Orchestra Hall, Chicago, Ill., June 3, 1911, relating to the Canadian reciprocity agreement. I ask that the address be printed as a public document. (S. Doc. No. 43.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

ABSORPTION OF TENNESSEE COAL & IRON CO.

Mr. CULBERSON. At the request of several Members of the House of Representatives I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document, first, the views of seven members of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary in 1909, with reference to the absorption of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. by the Steel Trust, and, second, the hearings on that resolution by the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, upon which that report was based in part. (S. Doc. No. 44.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to say it was made at the request of the House?

Mr. CULBERSON. No, I did not; I said at the request of several Members of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. That is sufficient, then. I understand there is an effort on the part of the House to compel almost all the printing to be done by order of the Senate——

Mr. CULBERSON. On my own suggestion, I ask unanimous consent, because of the exhaustion of the print, that these two documents may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent for the printing of the documents.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to finish my statement, so that the Senate will understand it. There seems to be a rule adopted in the House that there shall be no unanimous consent allowed in the House for printing public documents, and many Members of the House are coming to Members of the Senate and asking that public documents be ordered printed here by unanimous consent. I think the object of that is to show at the end of the year that the printing of the Senate has increased in volume and the printing of the House has decreased in volume.

Therefore, Mr. President, until I know more about this particular request, I shall object to its being printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that he attributes a very small motive to Members of the House of Representatives in the objection which he has made, a suggestion which I am disposed to resent as a member of the same party to which the majority of the House of Representatives belongs.

Mr. SMOOT. I only state the information I have received. I do not state it on my own authority at all, but I state it upon information which I have received.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator might at least particularize in making a charge of this kind against the organization of the House of Representatives. He ought at least, Mr. President, particularize, be accurate, and give the source of his information.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants me to particularize, I will call attention to one case. There was a speech made by Representative MOON, of the House. Representative MOON wanted the speech printed as a public document in the House. It was refused, on the ground that the Committee on Printing was not going to agree to any unanimous-consent requests made in the House for printing. It was brought into the Senate, and a Senator asked unanimous consent that it be printed as a public document, and it was ordered printed by the Senate. It has been called to my attention by Members of the House, and therefore I want the Senate to understand the situation.

Mr. CULBERSON. The documents I have presented are Senate documents, and I move that they be printed as a Senate document, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. For what purpose does the Senator from Idaho rise?

Mr. HEYBURN. I rise for the purpose of making a suggestion in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Utah in regard to printing by unanimous consent the speech of Mr. MOON on the Judiciary Title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the motion of the Senator from Texas. It is that the documents which he has sent to the Clerk's desk be printed as a Senate document. The Senator from Idaho is now recognized.

Mr. HEYBURN. At the request of more than one Member of the Senate and of the House I asked that the speech introducing the Judiciary Title in the House, made by Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania on that occasion, be printed, because it contains a comparative reference and very valuable data, showing the changes that were made by the revision. Many calls have come from courts, judges, lawyers, and others interested to know just what changes were made and what was involved in the revision, and it being in concise form and well stated in that speech, which was a very able one, I adopted that as a method of sending out information to the courts and the bar of the country in order that they might understand it. It being a joint committee and the work of a joint committee, the Senate was just as much interested in having it go out as was the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. Was the Senator requested by Representative MOON to make that request of the Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. I conferred with him about it. I think the word "requested" would hardly be applicable. It was a recognized propriety.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator did it upon his own motion.

Mr. HEYBURN. Being the chairman of the joint committee, I did not hesitate at all to do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I wanted to have understood.

Mr. SMOOT. I had no motive in calling attention to this, and perhaps would not have done it, if I had not been asked by the Senator from Texas to state an instance, nor did I want to find any fault with the Senator from Idaho for doing it, but I think it was my duty as chairman of the Committee on Printing of the Senate to call attention to the facts as above stated.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to suggest to the Senator that I understand the document the Senator from Texas refers to is a hearing, not to any great extent, had before the Judiciary Committee when it had this matter under investigation, together with the views of certain members of that committee. It is a Senate document and a Senate matter, and I hope in this particular instance the Senator from Utah will not object to the printing.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator from Texas to state that this is a House document, but I see it is a Senate document.

Mr. CULBERSON. I stated distinctly when the issue was first made that they were Senate papers, not printed, however, as Senate documents, but being a report of seven members of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary and the hearings before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee upon which that report was in part based.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I should like to know just what the request of the Senator from Texas was.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will restate it, if the Senator wishes. It is that the documents which the Senator from Texas sent to the desk be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the request was for printing House documents, but I find they are not. The Senator from Texas wants to have them printed as a public document——

Mr. CULBERSON. I think I know what I want to have printed. I ask——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will wait until the Senator is through. I do not care to have him yield. When he concludes, I will take the floor in my own right.

Mr. SMOOT. As the documents are a hearing before the Senate committee, I am not going to object to printing it, but if it had been a hearing before the House committee I certainly would object to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah withdraws his objection. The Chair assumes that the Senator from Texas withdraws his motion, and by unanimous consent the request of the Senator from Texas is complied with. The order will be entered.

On motion of Mr. McLEAN, it was

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have here a very brief paper, being resolutions passed by a party of civil engineers, members of the American Society of Civil Engineers, at a meeting at Ancon, Canal Zone, March 15, 1911. I ask unanimous consent to have the paper printed in the RECORD as a matter of information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEYBURN in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The paper referred to is as follows:

We, a party of civil engineers, members of the American Society of Civil Engineers, having visited the Panama Canal at the cordial invitation of the President of the United States and the Secretary of War, desire to chronicle our impressions of this stupendous work now under construction, in order to show our appreciation to the President and the Secretary of War, and to give to the American people an idea of how the construction appears to men who have had experience in solving similar problems, although never on so large a scale.

We wish to express our gratification at the many evidences of energy, enthusiasm, and efficiency which mark the construction of this great engineering work, and to commend the economical handling and use of all labor and material.

The organization seems to be most complete and efficient, showing that the men chosen to conduct this great construction have proved equal to their task in the planning and execution of the work. By their example of loyalty, cooperation, and devotion they have been able to establish an "esprit de corps" which prevails throughout the entire force, from the chief engineer to the common laborer, and results in the greatest measure of efficiency and economy.

And, further, we wish to congratulate the Government that, in addition to the excellent engineering and construction forces above alluded to, it has been able to obtain as chairman and chief engineer, commissioners, and secretary men of such wise forethought and ability.

The plant and equipment seem most complete, not only as to quantity of machinery, but also in the wise selection of plant for each special piece of work. The problem of handling the excavated material, involving the constant moving of hundreds of trains daily in many directions, has been most effectively accomplished.

We were particularly impressed with the efficient methods by which the concrete is mixed and deposited in place, having in mind the great problem of assembling the raw material from long distances, and the disposal of such enormous quantities, from 7,000 to 8,000 yards per day, at a cost which is, in our opinion, most reasonable.

The wisdom of the employment of Government forces for the direction of the work and its execution by "day labor" has been fully justified by the results obtained, and is an ample guarantee that the work will be well done and completed within the estimated time, January 1, 1915.

The general design of the canal commends itself to our hearty approval, and the many details appear to have been worked out in a most thorough and skillful manner.

In our opinion the creation, in the heart of Central America of a typical American community, with all the best characteristics of American civilization, equal in health, social order, and contentment to communities of similar size in the United States, and the conversion of insanitary tropical cities into healthful places of abode, make the work the wonder of the century, and being of such fundamental importance to the success of this great enterprise should prove to the American people the ability of the Government to handle properly any problems of a similar nature.

Finally, this party of engineers wishes to acknowledge most heartily and in the fullest manner the many courtesies it has received at the hands of the members of the commission and their employees, all of whom have given us every facility for investigation and full information regarding all obscure points.

WM. H. WILEY,
J. W. ROLLINS,
Committee on Resolutions of the Civil Engineers' Party.

The above resolutions were presented at a meeting of the engineers' party at the Hotel Tivoli, Ancon, Canal Zone, March 15, 1911, and were unanimously adopted.

GEORGE A. KIMBALL,
Chairman, Boston, Mass.
H. J. BURT,
Secretary, Denver, Colo.

THE BUILDER OF THE CANAL.

[From the New York Sun.]

Col. George W. Goethals, in carrying on the colossal work intrusted to his management, is ahead of schedule. He is away under original estimates and previous accomplishments in a hundred particulars of time, of cost, of economy of operation, of thoroughness of construction. When the achievements of his engineering and administrative efficiency are finally measured by competent authority we believe that the exhibit will astonish the world. No wiser thing was ever done by the American Government than when it was decided to commit the execution of the Panama enterprise to one of our own Army engineers, and there was never a more fortunate choice of an individual than when this modest man of real power was put in charge.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. By direction of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I report the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont reports a resolution and asks for its present consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the resolution be first read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 60), as follows:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of the following members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, Senators DILLINGHAM, GAMBLE, JONES, KENYON, JOHNSTON of Alabama, FLETCHER, KERN, and LEA, be, and are hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed forthwith to investigate whether in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices, and whether he is now entitled to retain his seat.

That said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress; to hold sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation; to employ stenographers, counsel, accountants, and such other assistants as it may deem necessary; to send for persons, books, records, and papers; to administer oaths; and, as early as practicable, to report to the Senate the results of its investigation, including all testimony taken by it; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

The committee is further and specially instructed to inquire fully into and report upon the sources and use of the alleged "jack-pot" fund, or any other fund, in its relation to and effect, if any, upon the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I notice that the resolution is in some respects different from the resolution heretofore adopted by the Senate on this subject, and I object to its present consideration. I do so in order that I may have an opportunity to compare the two resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 7, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 6, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we would hallow Thy name in thought, word, and deed; hence we wait upon Thee for the quickening of that spark which makes us Thine and the whole world akin and which inspires to great thoughts, clean living, and noble deeds. Speak to us that we thus go forward to the tasks of the hour in faith, hope, and love. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, June 2, 1911, was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct a reference. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the consideration of the bill H. R. 11031 and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill, so that the House can understand what it is going to vote upon.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11031) making immediately available a part of the amount appropriated for inland transportation, by star routes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That of the sum of $7,117,000 appropriated for inland transportation, by star routes (excepting in Alaska), including temporary service to newly established offices, by the "Act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1911, the sum of $40,000 shall be immediately available.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11031, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I move that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of H. R. 11031, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will indulge us for a moment, the gentleman from Tennessee and myself may make an arrangement——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to hear what the gentleman from New York is saying.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will indulge me just a moment, the gentleman from Tennessee and myself may make a little arrangement to defer action on the motion until some future time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Tennessee to let the matter go over until the gentleman from Tennessee comes back—he is going away—without prejudice and without any report on the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When is he coming back?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will be away perhaps 10 days.

Mr. GARRETT. That is, subject to the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it will accommodate the gentleman from Tennessee to have the motion acted upon at a later date, and there will be no attempt to report the bill in the meantime, I am willing to let the matter stand over until some date to be agreed upon.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of any accommodation whatever to me; I am ready to dispose of it now; but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] desires to have the matter go over, and I am willing to accommodate him if it can be considered as pending, the time to be agreed upon hereafter for its disposition.

Mr. BURLESON. And no further action to be taken in the meantime?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course, I am not going to report the bill pending this motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. For it to go over until a time to be agreed upon by the gentlemen.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, of course I desire to reserve the point of order on the gentleman's motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to know what the point of order is. I do not wish this motion to go over with a point of order pending when I have no manner of ascertaining what the point to be pressed is. This motion is made under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The motion is under the rule, and the motion is not debatable. This proceeding, of course, is by unanimous consent. If any gentleman has any motion to make, the Chair will entertain it.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will wait until the other matter is disposed of.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be 30 minutes' debate on this motion—15 minutes to be controlled by myself and 15 minutes by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MANN. What about this side of the House? We are not entirely out of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to yield to gentlemen on that side of the House who are on my side of the controversy. I shall be delighted to have them all with me. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman, if he will allow me, touching time, that in my judgment, while this motion, standing as to this exact case, is not of great importance, it seems to me that under the rules of the House, with many appropriations committees and with other committees having jurisdiction under the rules, there is no more important question touching correct procedure, without regard to politics on either side of the aisle, than this. No greater question has been presented or can be presented.

Therefore I suggest to the gentleman that if there is to be a real contest about this matter 15 minutes' time on a side is not sufficient.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the controversy in this matter is on the question whether this bill is a deficiency bill or not. If it is a deficiency bill, it undoubtedly goes to the general Committee on Appropriations. If it is not a deficiency bill, it goes to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I think the gentlemen on the committees can settle that, without bringing the controversy before the House, by an investigation of the facts relating to the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the matter go over for the present without prejudice to either side. Of course, that means that no report shall be filed until the question is settled.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like some definite time to be fixed. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that no more important matter as to the machinery of the House can come up than the question of whether or not deficiencies are to remain with the Committee on Appropriations. I for one am not willing simply to let the matter go over indefinitely. It may be that some others of us will not be able to be here all the time. I would like to have some stipulation as to when the matter can be brought up.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] stated that he desired to be absent for a few days, and I presume the matter could go over until he returned.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not want the matter to go over on my account, of course. I want to go away for about two weeks, but it is utterly immaterial to me whether the matter goes over or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the matter goes over without prejudice, it can be ascertained by the committees whether it is a deficiency or not. If it is a deficiency, I take it that it will go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let the question be postponed until the 20th of June, with the understanding that the bill will not be reported in the meantime.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MANN. This is by unanimous consent. The gentleman suggests that perhaps the chairmen of the two committees could agree. The gentleman remembers that there are a number of appropriating committees of the House, and that there has been more or less controversy as to whether a bill was a deficiency bill or not. Would it not be just as well—no personal feeling being involved in this case at all, as I understand—to have the House settle it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to its being settled now. I do not think there is any question whatever, under the rules of this House, that a deficiency bill goes to the Committee on Appropriations, and should go there. Now, this is merely a question of fact, and I must say to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not understand the facts myself now.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman probably does not recall that at the last session of Congress the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads boldly avowed on the floor of the House their intention, if possible, to take jurisdiction over postal deficiencies, instead of having them go to the Committee on Appropriations, and not only avowed it, but carried their avowal into the law; and when deficiencies were stricken out in the House on points of order they were restored in another body and left in the bill in conference in a way that they could not be questioned in the House.

Now, would it not be just as well for the House, when it is not involved in these matters, to determine whether the rule with reference to deficiencies shall be enforced by the other appropriating committees, and the Committee on Appropriations have jurisdiction, or whether the various other appropriating committees shall endeavor to seize jurisdiction over deficiencies.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as there seems to be objection to the matter going over, I withdraw my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to submit a request for unanimous consent that two hours be permitted for debate upon this question, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the debate on this motion be extended two hours, one half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the other half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. Is there objection?

Mr. HAY. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from further consideration of H. R. 11031, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I modify the request, and make it one hour on a side. I understand that the gentleman who objected to two hours will not object to one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York modifies the request, to make it one hour instead of two.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire if the gentleman from Virginia objected to the length of the debate or to having debate at all upon the proposition.

Mr. HAY. The objection was made because I thought two hours was too long. I will not object to one hour.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that the House, in the position that it is in, might well afford to work to-day for two hours instead of one hour?

Mr. HAY. I do not care whether it will be working or not. Two hours is too long a time to devote to this question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We have a lot of other things to dispose of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] originally asked for two hours. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] desires to modify that by making it one hour.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask for an hour and a half. I think we are entitled to some time on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois suggests an hour and a half. He modifies the previous request, so that the real question is for unanimous consent for an hour and a half debate. May the Chair inquire of the gentleman from Illinois about the control of the time?

Mr. MANN. Controlled as before.

The SPEAKER. One half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the other by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. Is there objection to the hour and a half?

There was no objection.

DUTIES ON WOOL, ETC.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will yield to me for a moment, I desire to make a privileged report (No. 45).

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, with the recommendation that the bill pass without amendment.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file the views of the minority, and that they be printed with the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks permission to file the views of the minority and that they be printed with the report. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice that to-morrow I will move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

I now ask unanimous consent that, in addition to the bills that are printed for the folding room, 5,000 copies of this report may be printed, 1,000 for the use of the committee and 4,000 copies of the report to go to the credit of Members in the folding room.

Mr. PAYNE. Does that request include the views of the minority?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Including the views of the minority.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the report be printed, 1,000 for the use of the committee and 4,000 to go to the folding room. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, a gentleman on this side suggests that extra copies of the bill be also printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The bill is included in the report.

Mr. MANN. Well, we ought to have it printed separately. I thought the gentleman's request covered 5,000 extra copies of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to that; but the bill is included in the report.

Mr. MANN. I know; but the gentleman knows that the bill printed in the report will be printed in such fine type that the gentleman ought not to and I can not read it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will include in that request that 5,000 copies of the bill be printed in the same way.

Mr. MANN. May I inquire of the gentleman as to whether it will be practical to have the bill printed in parallel columns, showing this bill, the Wilson law, and the Payne law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that in the report the bill as printed carries the rates in the Payne law and in the Wilson law and in this bill, but does not carry the full bill.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the report is substantially the same in that respect as the bill presented to the Democratic caucus?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It will be very convenient for Members, if it were practical, as it seems to me it would be, to have printed in parallel columns the provisions of the bill and the two laws.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, it would be very difficult to have the bills prepared in parallel columns, but I have in my committee room a copy of all the recent tariff bills, and if the gentleman desires it on to-morrow I will present them to the House and ask unanimous consent that they be printed as a House document.

Mr. MANN. As to the wool schedule?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; as to the wool schedule; but not in parallel columns.

Mr. MANN. I think it might be very desirable, if that is the best thing that can be done.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, certainly to an indolent man like myself it would be well, and it seems to me practical, to have the bill, the Dingley law, and the Wilson law printed, and it is my recollection that it has been printed in that way before. It is merely as a matter of convenience.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, where does the gentleman desire to have it printed? Of course I do not care to have it injected into my report.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, not at all.

Mr. MANN. Not at all; but to have extra copies printed for the use of the House, showing the bill, the Wilson law, and the Payne law, which is practically the Dingley law, in parallel columns.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection——

Mr. MANN. If the committee clerks are able to make that up, I think it would be convenient to everybody in the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that request as a separate request.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if it is the intention to print both the Dingley law and the Payne law in parallel columns?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. The Payne law is the same as the Dingley.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. If we are going to have these bills printed in parallel columns, we ought to put in both the Dingley law and the Payne law.

Mr. MANN. Of course there is not much difference.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. That is what I want to know, and to have it done to show that difference.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to printing them all, but you can not put them on a sheet of paper that is convenient. You can print three parallel columns on a piece of paper in such shape that we can get at it conveniently, as we have done repeatedly from our committee.

The SPEAKER. What is the request?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My request is, Mr. Speaker, that 5,000 copies of the bill and report, including the minority views, be printed in addition to those ordinarily printed and distributed in the document room, and that of those 5,000 copies 1,000 shall go to the Committee on Ways and Means and 4,000 shall go to Members of the House to their credit in the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the bill and the report, including the minority report, be printed in addition to the usual number of bills printed; that 1,000 of them shall go to the Committee on Ways and Means and 4,000 to the folding room for use of the Members. Without objection, it is so ordered. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed a thousand copies of the proposed bill, the Wilson law, and the Payne law, so far as the woolen schedules are concerned, in parallel columns, if that can be prepared by the clerks of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say that it will be quite difficult and it will probably take some time for the clerks to prepare those bills in parallel columns, but I can furnish to-morrow copies of all the recent woolen schedules, not in parallel columns, but the one following the other, and they can be printed at once, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman from Alabama will allow me a suggestion, we had before the committee last week something that was very close approaching to printing those three bills in parallel columns.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection——

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to covering the whole thing, if it can be put in a shape that is readable and convenient of access.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course all of them can not be put in parallel columns. The gentleman is right; you can put but three in parallel columns, but I have no objection to the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. What is the request now?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the necessity of printing the Dingley law and the present act, because there are only two changes in the present law from the Dingley law, and those are minor changes. I have no objection to it, but I do not see the necessity for it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, my request is to print 1,000 copies of the proposed bill on the woolen schedule, the Wilson, and the Payne law in parallel columns.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Illinois is that 1,000 copies of the woolen schedule of the proposed bill, the Wilson law, and the Payne law be printed in parallel columns. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois to make this request 5,000 copies; and the reason for asking that it be made that number is that there is a widespread interest in this question throughout the country, and the Members of the House will be receiving requests for this document, covering this comparison, and will be unable to comply with the requests. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he make his request for 5,000 copies.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman that these be first printed, and if it can be put in a convenient form and there is any occasion we can very easily increase the number, but if it is going to be bulky and inconvenient we would not like to send them out, although we might use them here.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois accept?

Mr. MANN. I think it would be well for us to wait until it is first printed.

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not insist upon my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois as stated by the Chair? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FULLER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Mary R. C. Blanchard, Sixty-first and Sixty-second Congresses, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from New York proceeds, I desire to ask him if his committee has met and passed a resolution demanding jurisdiction of the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman that the Committee on Appropriations met and authorized me to make the motion in the House.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then the point of order is not well taken, if that is the fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand there is no question of order pending against the motion.

The question before the House, Mr. Speaker, is one of vital importance, not only to the orderly transaction of the business of the House, but to the proper administration and expenditure of the public funds. The bill which is the subject of controversy purports to make immediately available for the public service for the current fiscal year $40,000 of the amount appropriated for the next fiscal year, which commences on the 1st of July. The Committee on Appropriations contends that this bill is to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the existing fiscal year.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York suspend? The Chair desires to say that the matter that is being debated by these gentlemen is a matter of vast importance to the House, not only with respect to this particular bill, but also to scores of other bills that are liable to come up, and these gentlemen are entitled to be heard, and the Chair is entitled to have a chance to hear what they say. Gentlemen who desire to converse will please leave the Hall. The gentleman from New York will now proceed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The contention of the Committee on Appropriations is that this bill is to supply a deficiency in the appropriations made for the service of the present fiscal year. The appropriation for this service, carried in the Post Office appropriation bill, was $7,170,000. It now appears that an attempt is to be made to increase the amount that is to be expended by $40,000. The disposition of this motion does not at all affect the question as to whether the appropriations should be made or shall be made. The merits of the request for the money are not involved. The only question involved is, To which committee should this request be referred for investigation?

Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to understand the method by which estimates are made for the public service and by which appropriations following the estimates are made in order to understand the question involved here. Section 3669 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

All annual estimates for the public service shall be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be included in the Book of Estimates prepared under his direction.

In 1884 a statute was enacted (July 7, 1884; Stat. L., vol. 23, p. 254) which provided that—

All estimates of appropriations and estimates of deficiencies in appropriations intended for the consideration and seeking the action of any of the committees of Congress shall be transmitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and in no other manner; and the said Secretary shall first cause the same to be properly classified, compiled, indexed, and printed under the supervision of the chief of the division of warrants, estimates, and appropriations of his department.

In addition to that provision, in the year 1906 (June 22, 1906, Stat. L., vol. 34, p. 448, sec. 4) this statute was enacted:

Hereafter the heads of the several executive departments and all other officers authorized or required to make estimates for the public service shall include in their annual estimates furnished the Secretary of the Treasury for inclusion in the Book of Estimates all estimates of appropriations required for the service of the fiscal year for which they are prepared and submitted, and special or additional estimates for that fiscal year shall only be submitted to carry out laws subsequently enacted or when deemed imperatively necessary for the public service by the department in which they shall originate, in which case such special or additional estimate shall be accompanied by a full statement of its imperative necessity and reasons for its omission in the annual estimates.

In compliance with these statutes the Post Office Department submitted estimates for the fiscal year 1911, which closes the 30th of this month, for the star-route service, in an amount of $7,201,000.

Under the rules, the estimates were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and when the Post Office appropriation bill was finally enacted into law the appropriation for the star-route service was $7,170,000, or $31,000 less than the estimates.

For many years it had been the practice of the departments, after they had submitted estimates to Congress, and after Congress had passed upon the estimates and determined how much, in its judgment, should be expended for any particular service, deliberately to ignore the appropriation and to carry on the various services as if the amount originally estimated had been granted, and then ask Congress to supply its failure in the first instance to give what in the opinion of the department should have been granted by making deficiency appropriations. So great did that abuse become that in 1905 or 1904 the deficiency appropriations in a single year aggregated the enormous sum of more than $40,000,000.

Congress determined to keep in hand its control of the public funds, and that it should settle how much should be expended for any service and not have some administrative officer determine that question, and in 1906 it enacted what is known as the antideficiency law, the act which I shall read.

Although this was not the first attempt of Congress to control this matter, the former attempt had failed because the departments had evaded the law previously adopted, and there was no manner in which to stop the then prevailing practices. So a second attempt was made, and this provision of law was enacted:

No executive department or other Government establishment of the United States shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract or other obligation for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations unless such contract or obligation is authorized by law. Nor shall any department or any officer of the Government accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law, except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property. All appropriations made for contingent expenses or other general purposes, except appropriations made in fulfillment of contract obligations expressly authorized by law, or for objects required or authorized by law without reference to the amounts annually appropriated therefor, shall, on or before the beginning of each fiscal year, be so apportioned by monthly or other allotments as to prevent expenditures in one portion of the year which may necessitate deficiency or additional appropriations to complete the service of the fiscal year for which said appropriations are made; and all such apportionments shall be adhered to and shall not be waived or modified except upon the happening of some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance which could not be anticipated at the time of making such apportionment, but this provision shall not apply to the contingent appropriations of the Senate or House of Representatives; and in case said apportionments are waived or modified as herein provided, the same shall be waived or modified in writing by the head of such executive department or other Government establishment having control of the expenditure, and the reasons therefor shall be fully set forth in each particular case and communicated to Congress in connection with estimates for any additional appropriations required on account thereof. Any person violating any provision of this section shall be summarily removed from office and may also be punished by a fine of not less than $100 or by imprisonment for not less than one month. (Feb. 27, 1906, Stat. L., vol. 34, p. 49, sec. 3.)

This statute was enacted in 1906, and since that time the deficiencies in the service in the various departments have not exceeded $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 in any one fiscal year, and they have invariably been deficiencies which, under the law, are recognized as being properly incurred by the heads of the departments.

Now, the appropriation for this branch of the postal service was made for the present fiscal year in the Post Office appropriation act for the fiscal year 1911, the current fiscal year. No estimate has been submitted by the Post Office Department for an additional sum. No request has come in the manner provided by law for this additional money. No statement has been made as to whether the appropriation was apportioned in accordance with the law, and because of some condition arising as provided by the statute it has been necessary to waive it and the reasons for such waiver transmitted to Congress, as required by the statute. But this bill was introduced proposing to increase the money available for the service during this fiscal year by $40,000. If additional money be required for this service, it is money required as a deficiency in the appropriation now available for the service, because the appropriations having heretofore been made the department is required to confine itself to those appropriations unless for some reason specified in the statute it can properly ask or incur additional expenditures to those provided.

The rules of the House provide that all deficiencies, all estimates for deficiencies, shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The contention, as I understand it, of those who insist that this bill should be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is that under the rules there should be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads all proposed legislation, including appropriations for the support of that department. I submit that this is not a bill or an estimate for an appropriation for the support of the department, but it is to supply a deficiency in the appropriations heretofore made.

When the Post Office appropriation bill was under consideration in the last session of Congress the chairman of that committee boldly avowed that, in the opinion of the members of that committee, deficiency appropriations for the Post Office Department should be made by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and that, in that belief, they had requested the Postmaster General to submit to the committee, not in the manner required by law, not in regular estimates through the Secretary of the Treasury, not as the rules provide in communications addressed to the House through the Speaker for reference to the proper committees in the House, but to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads itself, a statement of the amounts of money that would be required to enable the department to complete its service during the present fiscal year. As a result of the statement submitted there were included in the Post Office appropriation bill more than $2,000,000 of appropriations for deficiencies; and the chairman stated that it was the intention thereafter to make such deficiency appropriations in the Post Office bill.

The result was that, although more than $2,000,000 of deficiency appropriations have been made for the Post Office Department for the present fiscal year through the medium of the Post Office Committee, not a single estimate for any one of those items has ever been submitted to Congress in accordance with the law and in conformity with the rules of the House, and no investigation has ever been made to ascertain whether the antideficiency act was complied with by the department when those deficiencies were incurred.

I wish to call attention of the House to a statement made by a gentleman, not now a Member of this House, but one who enjoyed the confidence of Members on both sides, as to the vicious practice of making appropriations immediately available in appropriation bills in the manner done in the Post Office bill. Mr.

Tawney, who was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for six years, and who retired at the end of the last Congress, submitted his annual review of the appropriations made by Congress at its last session, which statement appears in the RECORD of the 10th of March of this year. He was speaking of what he believed to be the unwisdom of having the appropriations distributed among a number of committees, and he said:

Not the least of the evils resulting from this system of several committees controlling appropriation bills is the practice of making appropriations immediately available. To such an extent has this grown that large portions of many sums carried in appropriation bills purporting to provide for the running expenses of an ensuing fiscal year are, in fact, designed to cover deficiencies that already exist or are anticipated in a preceding year, thus evading the penalties of the anti-deficiency law and defeating the very purpose of the creation by law of our Government fiscal year, which was established in order that Congress might have an accurate measure of time, adjusted to the beginning and closing of the regular sessions, by which to gauge the operating expenses of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, right at the outset of this Congress we are confronted with this question that must be determined, and that is whether the departments are to be compelled to submit their requests for deficiencies in the manner prescribed by law and in accordance with the rules of the House, or whether they are to seek out those places where it may be possible without the scrutiny which the law intends shall be given for increases in their current appropriations and thus evade the penalties of the law.

This applies not only to this bill, but it will apply to a large number of other bills which will be introduced. If these deficiencies are to be scrutinized by the Committee on Appropriations, and if the policy of the House as expressed in its rules is to be carried out, and that committee—as was pointed out in 1885 when the appropriation bills were distributed among the various committees of the House—if that one committee is to have at least some comprehensive control of the actions of the departments, it is important that this bill be now sent to the Committee on Appropriations, so that if a deficiency really exists in the appropriation for this service it may be granted if the law has been complied with, or if the law has not been complied with the penalties be enforced against those responsible for its violation before the appropriations be made. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves the balance of his time, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, of course I am aware, and every other Member of this House is aware, that the distinguished gentleman from New York and his committee are much more able, much more capable of looking after the welfare of this Government than the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in appropriations. I know they would give that attention which would be impossible to any other committee of ordinary ability in this House to bestow upon public questions, and if I were involved in this matter only in treating with the question of jurisdiction I would readily yield my judgment and transfer this bill to the gentleman from New York and his committee, but I apprehend that the judgment of this House is, or may be, at least, that the balance of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is about as patriotic, about as honest, and about as capable as the gentleman from New York and his committee. Now, it is not a matter in which I have any feeling. I do not care anything about this bill, whether it goes to one committee or the other, but it is a question of jurisdiction, a conflict of jurisdiction between these two committees. The Postmaster General of the United States communicated with the Committees on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House and Senate and recommended the passage of this bill. The bill was introduced in the House. The Speaker thought it ought to go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and it went there.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, yes; for a minute.

Mr. SHERLEY. When the Postmaster General came to this committee with this request was he not violating the plain letter of the law?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, no; he is not doing anything of the sort; he is keeping within the letter of the law.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then what is the meaning of the provision with reference to submitting estimates for deficiencies——

Mr. BURLESON. Through the Treasury Department.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman will wait he will find out what we think about it. Mr. Speaker, that committee met, considered this bill, and ordered a report. A report has been drafted and is ready to be introduced into this House, and has not been introduced in view of objections made. Now, the gentleman from New York comes with his motion, assuming the superiority of his committee and the legal right under the law to take jurisdiction of this matter. Now, just for a moment on the question of jurisdiction, and I want to say, too, all that the gentleman from New York may have said and all that he may have read in reference to estimates may be true and proper under a proper state of facts, but it has no application in the matter we are now considering, from the point of view I take. The jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations appropriating the revenues for the support of the Government as herein provided is for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for sundry civil expenses, for fortifications and coast defense, for the District of Columbia, for pensions, and for all deficiencies. The jurisdiction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is over all bills in reference to post offices and post roads, including appropriations for their support. While I think as a primary question the sensible thing for this House to do would be to denude this committee of its ever-usurping power in this House—the Committee on Appropriations—from the control of all deficiencies, and allow each committee from which deficiencies come, or the department over which the committee has control, to dispose of them, still under the existing law I concede the right to the Committee on Appropriations to pass on the question of deficiencies.

Is this a deficiency? Who says so? There is nothing on the face of this bill declaring that it is a deficiency. As a matter of fact, there is absolutely no deficiency at this moment, and there will not be for some time in the Post Office Department on the item for the transportation of mail by star routes. That is the fact.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question now?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I will not. I want to proceed with my argument.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee declines to yield.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not propose to be cut off from the line of my argument by gentlemen interjecting something unimportant.

Now, there is no deficiency, as a matter of fact. It does not appear from the face of these papers, nor can any gentleman say there is a deficiency from the face of this paper.

The question is this: Has the Congress of the United States, through its Post Office Committee, the right or, in other words, has that committee the right and jurisdiction, to report a bill to this House making available a portion of an appropriation for another year? If it appears that it is for a deficiency on the face of the bill, I say no. If it does not so appear, then where is the jurisdiction in the Committee on Appropriations to control this matter in the absence of the proof of a deficiency? This Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has the jurisdiction of appropriations for that department. It has got a right to make as many bills as this House sees fit to pass. In the discharge of that duty and the maintenance of the public service it has the right to pass a law so as to prevent a deficiency.

That is all this bill is. It is a bill that prevents the coming of a deficiency. That deficiency may come; it may not come. We have got a right to pass a law, having the control of the appropriations for that department, to avoid a deficiency or for any other purpose falling within the section which I have read.

It is not a question whether this House, in its judgment, is going to take up the bill and pass it. That has nothing to do with the question. The question now before the House is whether the legal status of this bill presents on its face the existence of a deficiency or not. I assert that no man can read this bill and say a deficiency exists. It may be unwise to make this appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It may be improper to make this appropriation, but there is no proof now of a deficiency. As a matter of fact, a deficiency may occur. It may be imminent, but it has not occurred, and until it does occur the Committee on Appropriations can have no jurisdiction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No. I did not interrupt the gentleman when he was speaking, and I do not want to be interrupted myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. A deficit has a special and particular significance. It means that when an appropriation has been made for a specific governmental service and that appropriation has been exhausted and that service has not been performed, then there exists a deficiency. That is not the state of facts now. There is no deficiency this minute on that appropriation. There may be; there may not be. The Postmaster General has stated the facts in reference to the matter. But you are determining now a question of jurisdiction. You are not determining a question as to the merits of this bill. You are determining whether under the existing state of facts as disclosed on the face of the bill—that is all that is before you—a deficiency does in fact exist in the department.

The gentleman says well that it is the duty of the department to make estimates for and give information of these deficiencies, and so forth. The department has not done so. The prima facie presumption is that the deficiency, therefore, does not exist. My information is that the deficiency does not exist now; but, Mr. Speaker, let us settle this question in the light of common sense. Let us not appeal to facts de hors the record. A question of jurisdiction can not be settled that way.

Suppose this matter were one falling within the jurisdiction of one of the courts and a motion to dismiss for the want of jurisdiction was made. Is there any lawyer in this House who would undertake to say for a moment that you could present extraneous facts in the determination of that motion? You would have to proceed otherwise, possibly by pleas in abatement, to reach facts that you desire to have in judgment in order to determine the question. The fact is not in judgment before this House that there is any deficiency in the department. It is not necessary for me to say that there is no deficiency while that is the fact, because it is upon the facts of this bill, and this bill alone, that the question of jurisdiction must be determined, regardless of any question of merit.

I assert, then, that under the power to make appropriations for the support of the department the jurisdiction applies properly to the Post Office Committee, unless the bill shows upon its face the existence of a deficiency which is sought to be met by the terms of the bill. That is untrue. There is no deficiency. There may never be a deficiency. The desire to extend the service may have prompted this legislation that is called for. Whatever be the motive—and I do not care what the motive is—if it be conceded that the bill were drawn as it is in order to avoid the question of deficiency—that is not the truth; yet if that were true—it is so drawn that no deficiency appears on the face of the papers; and the House, in determining the question of jurisdiction, will look to the bill alone and to no facts on the outside.

Further, let me repeat that when you proceed to the investigation of the facts on the outside you will find that there is no deficiency.

So, upon what authority, either of law or of fact, do you propose to give to this committee jurisdiction over a question that directly belongs, for the purposes of appropriation, to the Post Office and Post Roads Committee? The question is as clear to my mind as it can be; and while I am on my feet I want to repeat the necessity, in the interest of good and honest government, of taking away from this Appropriations Committee the assumption of authority; under the law it may be, but let it be changed. Every committee in this House knows better what the appropriations ought to be for the particular department with which it is familiar than does the Committee on Appropriations. It has ample work. We have noticed the attempt of that committee to exercise power. Mr. Jefferson said once that the Federal courts of this country were stealing like thieves over the field of jurisdiction. That remark is most thoroughly applicable to this Committee on Appropriations. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I desire to interrupt the gentleman from Kentucky before he begins his argument. Will the gentleman mind stating what the procedure would be on the part of the Postmaster General if this were an original appropriation for the support of the department? Has he followed that proceeding in this case?

Mr. SHERLEY. He has not. If it had been an original appropriation, he would have had to submit an estimate.

Mr. BURLESON. Through the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not emulate the example of the gentleman from Tennessee by indulging in any facetious remarks as to the respective abilities of the personnel of these two great committees. Those who are familiar with the history of the evolution of appropriation bills in this House know that a very great struggle took place here, the result of which was to take away from the Committee on Appropriations the then exclusive power over all appropriations; and one of the determining factors in that result, as shown by the debates, was the declaration by those favoring the change that they had left to the Committee on Appropriations control over deficiencies, and that thereby you would still have one central committee dealing with the entire subject of appropriations.

It is impossible within five minutes, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the broad question of whether it is wise to have one central authority or not. To that question I shall some day address myself at length. This is the proposition now: Is this particular bill a bill for the purpose of supplying a deficiency in the Post Office Department? If it is, then, by the concession of the gentleman himself, it belongs to the Committee on Appropriations, and the fact that he thinks it ought not to belong there has nothing to do with the case.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] states to you that this House must look to form and can not look to substance; that we are prevented from really looking at the real gist of the matter, but must take the form, and if there is enough ingenuity in the heads of the departments to present a bill in such form as to make it seem not a deficiency, when in point of fact it either actually is or is in immediate contemplation of one, the House is tied. The question is not simply whether his committee will give proper consideration to the bill. The question is whether the law of the land shall be obeyed by the heads of the departments, and that is a larger matter of consideration than either of the committees of the House. We have passed a law which says that they must submit estimates for their regular appropriations and for their deficiencies. If there is going to be no deficiency, why make available this money?

Why, Mr. Speaker, in 25 days the fiscal year in which the gentleman wants authority to expend this money will have ended. The idea of expecting this House to look at the facts, to believe that the object of this is not to make a deficiency, is to ask us to ignore the substance and to look only to shadow. On the face of this bill it would be held under all of the precedents to be a deficiency appropriation. It provides that of the money appropriated for the next fiscal year $40,000 of it shall be available now. Eleven months have passed of the fiscal year, and yet the gentleman would have us believe that the need of this $40,000 is not because of a deficiency that is going to arise or has arisen in the Post Office Department. For what purpose, pray, is the $40,000 to be used, if it is not to be used for a deficiency? When the gentleman can answer that, he will have made some showing for his case. He would not have us inquire, and neither would the Postmaster General, apparently, have us inquire into the Postmaster General's motives. Does the House stop to think that one of the most important things in keeping control over the expenditures of a government is in knowing how much money is expended during each fiscal year? Why have these yearly limitations? Why not make any sum that has been appropriated available at any time, unless for the purpose of holding the departments within fixed periods of time, that we may know what they are expending? It may be that the gentleman's committee obtained full information about this matter. I have no doubt they did, or they would not have reported it, but I do know that the Postmaster General did not obey the law in submitting an estimate, that if this was the beginning of the fiscal year instead of the end of one, and he desired to make available some of the money that was to be appropriated for the then year, he would submit estimates and reasons therefor.

[The time of Mr. SHERLEY having expired, he was granted two minutes more by Mr. FITZGERALD.]

Mr. Speaker, it is rather a curious twisting of the history of legislation in this House to say that the Committee on Appropriations is all of the time seeking to obtain power, to take power away from the other committees. The fact is that the Committee on Appropriations has had the power, and the other committees have constantly sought to take away this power from the Committee on Appropriations. But that is not the quesion. You are not considering now what the law ought to be, you are considering simply what it is, and the gentleman himself confesses that we have jurisdiction of all deficiencies. It is the only possible way now left to the House whereby there is any one committee that may be conversant with the entire legislation of appropriations of the session.

We are the only major country on the globe that appropriates money unscientifically through many sources of authority. Every other country of any magnitude has one source of power. What has been the history in the way of increases? Take the appropriations during the long session of the last Congress, and while the Committee on Appropriations cut down estimates, reduced them, all of the other separate appropriating committees increased the estimates. This side of the House is pledged to economy in appropriations.

If it wants to have real economy it must somewhere, somehow, give to some one committee practical control over the entire budget. If the gentleman, under the form in which this bill is drawn, can get charge of this matter, the law in regard to deficiencies is a nullity. No longer can we obtain obedience to the laws and no longer can we force the heads of departments to submit to us estimates giving their reasons therefor. We have fought year after year against the departments to do away with the great abuse of deficiencies; not only of deficiencies, but of transfers of items——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask the House not to follow the specious plea of the gentleman from Tennessee, but look to the substance and not alone to the form.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee to use some of his time, if he can.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am willing to yield time, but no one has asked for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the matter is very plain, the rule is very plain, and the practice of the House heretofore, except when the rules have been disregarded, is very plain. I was in Congress when these appropriation bills were divided and assigned to the Committees on Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Foreign Affairs, Indian Affairs, the Post Office and Post Roads, and, perhaps, one other committee, and they became appropriation committees. The House kept the regular Appropriations Committee, but defined the jurisdiction of each committee.

Now our method of appropriations is provided for by law. First there must be estimates. The Executive must ask, and that is well hedged about. He must ask in a certain way, namely, in detail, sending the estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury sends them to the House, and the Speaker refers those estimates, under the rules, to the appropriate committees.

We have had great difficulty through all these years, under all administrations, in keeping the whip hand, as a branch of government coordinate to the Executive. We had great difficulty. Many times in my recollection the specious pretense has been made that an Executive can do anything that is not prohibited by law. The truth is that he can not do anything that he is not permitted to do by law, under our form of government.

Now, my friend, Mr. MOON of Tennessee, for whom I have high respect, was not quite as candid as he ordinarily is when he started out to make an attack on the Committee on Appropriations, implying that that committee, like a Colossus, doth bestride not the world, but the appropriations. That is an old story in this House. The rule determines the jurisdiction, and the rule is a wise one, as long as these bills are to be distributed; namely, that the deficiencies—that is, the amounts required after the annual appropriations are made for the coming fiscal year, if anything else is required under the law, is a deficiency. It is an additional appropriation, not for the next year, but this year. That is a deficiency, and that is this case.

Oh, but my friend says there is no deficiency and there may never be a deficiency. Under the law, if it is observed by the executive, there never can be a deficiency except in case of great emergency, and that great emergency has to be estimated for; but here there is no estimate at all.

My friend says they have considered it. Well, now, the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Foreign Affairs—all the other committees—might conceive that more money was needed, and without estimates we should be at sea.

What is this? Suppose this bill fails. Can the Postmaster General legally expend more than the $7,000,000 in round numbers that were appropriated for this purpose last year for the current fiscal year?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. One minute more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield the gentleman two minutes additional.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for an additional two minutes.

Mr. CANNON. That is quite sufficient.

Mr. MANN. Give him five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. All right. Now, the bill on its face does not say that there is appropriated so much for a deficiency. Oh, no. But it is to make immediately available a part of the amount appropriated for inland transportation by star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure; but first, before he asks it, when does the fiscal year 1912 begin?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The fiscal year 1912 begins on the 1st day of July, 1911.

Mr. CANNON. And when does it end? On the 30th day of June, 1912.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Now, anticipating the public service, under the leadership of your committee this service was appropriated for in that bill, not for this fiscal year 1911, but for the fiscal year 1912, and there could not be one cent of that money used before the 1st day of July without the executive officer being made liable to indictment or impeachment, because under our form of law you can not use money until it is appropriated.

I will yield in a moment to the gentleman from Tennessee. Now, my friend is seeking to make available, not for 1912, but for the fiscal year 1911, which closes on the 30th of June, an appropriation intended for the year 1912, and in that attempt he gives us this bill and says it is not a deficiency bill. I never knew before that by mere language you could make such a change of fact or of substance. I never knew, for example, if a baby is a negro baby that by mere language you could make it a white baby. [Laughter.] And I never knew that you could take a rose and make it a jimson weed by mere language. [Laughter.] Now I will yield to my friend.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. A good many roses are really jimson weeds when we get at them. [Laughter.] I wanted to ask the gentleman from Illinois this question.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Suppose, as a matter of fact, that there is no deficiency for the star-route transportation, and that the department, if there is no deficiency, desired the money taken out of the appropriation for next year for the purpose of extending inland transportation by star routes now, and a bill was prepared for the purpose, and no deficiency existed, would not that bill go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads regardless of its merits?

Mr. CANNON. No, it would not. The legislation would go to the Post Office Committee; that would provide for the postal service in the future.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But the Post Office Committee makes appropriations and legislates, too.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. But here the rule provides that all proposed legislation relating—to the Post Office and post roads, including appropriations for their support—shall be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Now——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman do this—does he not confuse the merits of this question, upon which he may be right, with the question of jurisdiction?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all. I am going to ask the gentleman—because this is an important matter—to yield me a little more from his time, if I need it.

Now, what is referred to the Committee on Appropriations?

Appropriations of the revenue for the support of the Government as herein provided, viz, for legislative, executive and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses—and for all deficiencies; to the Committee on Appropriations.

And so on—

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is conceded.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me a couple of minutes?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee yields five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON:

And for all deficiencies; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, there are two rules: First—

To the Post Office and post roads, including appropriations for their support; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

And next—

And for all deficiencies; to the Committee on Appropriations.

What is a deficiency? The gentleman from Tennessee having provided for the service for the coming fiscal year by the annual appropriation bill, as he did under the leadership of his committee, he has exhausted his jurisdiction as to appropriations. So with all the other committees.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say that if any other subject matter of jurisdiction under the law should come before that committee it would not have the right to consider it?

Mr. CANNON. It would not have the right to consider any possible appropriation except the annual appropriation. If it is a deficiency appropriation, it goes to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If it is a deficiency, I concede it.

Mr. CANNON. My friend seems to contend that all the money must be exhausted by a department and some more; in other words, that the department officials must have committed a misdemeanor——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; the gentleman misunderstands me. The term "deficiency" has a legal significance.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It means that when an appropriation is made for a specific public purpose and that appropriation has been exhausted, and that purpose is not performed, then legally a deficiency exists that minute. It can not, in contemplation of law, exist until the money appropriated has been expended.

Mr. CANNON. On the contrary, what is this appropriation that the gentleman seeks by this appropriation act to make available for the last month of 1911? It is an appropriation for the public service of 1912. Now, the deficiency, in the light of this rule, is the annual appropriation that may be necessary for the current fiscal year—that is, for the year 1911. The money could not have been expended under the legislation which we have passed heretofore without a misdemeanor and, in some instances, an impeachable offense being committed.

The gentleman's committee reports bills for the annual expenditures in the future; but if that is appropriated for under law, and there is an additional amount to reinforce the annual appropriation, then it is a deficiency.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest that if this particular item were in the annual appropriation bill, under the rules of the House it would be held to be out of order, because providing for a deficiency for this fiscal year?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; absolutely.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But if the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, suppose that is all true. Suppose that the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New York and myself exactly agree on the question of the merits when the deficiency comes. What objection have you, what objection can you make under the law, to a committee charged with all appropriations for the post office and the legislation for the post office taking jurisdiction of the question previous to the time when the other committee may take jurisdiction? Because their jurisdiction can not come until the deficit comes.

Mr. BURLESON. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me to suggest right here, in a majority of cases estimates are sent in for deficiencies before they actually occur.

Mr. CANNON. Almost invariably.

Mr. BURLESON. Nearly always.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman's point is that the Post Office Committee should first ascertain the fact that there is a deficiency.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; there never can be a deficiency, except in an extraordinary emergency, without a crime being committed—that is, a deficiency in the sense of an expenditure that has not been authorized by law. This is nothing more or less than an additional appropriation, not for the next year, but for the last month of this year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Cox of Ohio). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I give the gentleman four minutes more. I hope he will go ahead.

Mr. CANNON. I thank the gentleman. This is an important matter. I have no pride of the jurisdiction of committees. Why, take these expenditure committees——

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CANNON. I have only a moment.

Mr. CARLIN. We will give you more time.

Mr. CANNON. All right.

Mr. CARLIN. If, as the gentleman says, there could not be a deficiency except by a violation of law, then this would not go to the Appropriations Committee, because there is no deficiency.

Mr. CANNON. On the contrary, while that seems to be plausible, I have talked in vain if I have not shown to the gentleman that deficiencies are additional appropriations for the current fiscal year, where there has not been enough appropriated in the annual bill. I think that is perfectly plain. I think I understand it; but now let us take these expenditures. Here are several expenditure committees, and it will be seen that the examination of accounts and expenditures in the departments of the Government, the manner of keeping the same, the economy, justice, and correctness of such expenditures, their conformity with appropriation laws, the proper application of public moneys, the security of the Government against unjust and extravagant demands, and so on, the abolishment of useless offices, the reduction or increase of the pay of officers, all these shall be subjects within the jurisdiction of the respective committees on expenditures. Now, I have seen those committees—either because of innocuous desuetude or because of the encroachment of the Committee on Naval Affairs or on Military Affairs or the Post Office—have their jugulars absolutely cut. Yet there is the jurisdiction, and I am very glad to know that these committees on expenditures are attempting, at least, and, I take it, intelligently attempting, to take the jurisdiction and perform the duties assigned to them under the rules.

Mr. Speaker, one further word. This matter of appropriation, unless guarded properly and zealously, will breed abuses. Why, after these bills were divided a Senator, whose name I will not call, and who was a delightful man, induced the Senate, by amendment, to put an appropriation on a bill where it did not belong. That bill came back here, and the conference committee struck it out. The House sustained the conference committee. Then he went around and put it on another appropriation bill. It was stricken out again. Then, on a third general appropriation bill, he put it on again. Now, respectfully speaking, sometimes they do not pay much attention to rules in the other body. This was stricken out again. Finally, however, on another general appropriation bill it escaped attention, and it was enacted into law, not because it met the approval of Congress, but owing to the diligence of this Senator. I recollect saying to him laughingly that he was the greatest legislative courtesan I had ever met. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I think we had better enforce these rules. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Eight minutes. And the gentleman from Tennessee has 23 minutes remaining.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he will not use some of his time now?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Well, I have been granting most of my time to the gentleman's side of the debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman desire to use any more time?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; but I have nobody to use it, unless you want me to use a little bit of it myself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then we can close the matter up in a very short time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. Personally I would be in favor of giving every appropriation bill in the House to one committee on condition that they would not legislate in the other body, or in this either, for that matter, but I want to ask this question: Is not a committee that handles an appropriation bill better calculated to judge whether or not the deficiency is a proper and wise deficiency, one that should be allowed, than a committee that has not charge of that particular appropriation bill?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman wants an answer, I should think that a committee that year in and year out studies the appropriations for a particular department and makes them would at least be as competent to pass on a question of deficiency as any other committee not connected with such department.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman from Tennessee does not claim that that is the issue before the House at this time?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is not the issue before the House.

Mr. SIMS. Not being on either committee, I am more anxious to get the best results than I am about the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am going to use just a few minutes, and then I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman begins, I want to ask him if it is the purpose, through this $40,000 sought to be appropriated by this bill, to extend the star-route service and replace the Rural Free Delivery Service, as was recommended by the Postmaster General in his last annual report and was suggested by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General in his report—to have them cooperate together so that the rural routes will not be established as fast and as efficiently as they should be and as they have not been during the last three years for some reason, and in the place of them to extend the old star-route service?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, I do not understand that to be the purpose of the bill at all.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not say the purpose of the bill, but I suggest——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Not in the most remote degree. The money is not to be used for the purpose of extending the star routes to the detriment of existing rural routes.

Mr. BARTLETT. But the Rural Delivery Service has been curtailed, and in place it has been suggested that the star-route service be promoted, and as the department comes in and asks for $40,000 for the extension of that service and did not ask anything for the rural service, it looks like they are attempting to give the star-route service the preference.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Let me answer the gentleman from Georgia first. I want to say to the gentleman from Georgia I think there is no such purpose involved in this measure, and, further, that that question is not now before us. I am not able to answer him as to the purpose or intent of the Postmaster General. I do not know what his views are on this question, but I presume they are in accordance with the best public interest.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not want the gentleman from Tennessee to understand I intimated in any way that is his purpose, because I know it is not.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this proviso was put in the rule giving to the Committee on Appropriations jurisdiction of all deficiencies by way of a check upon the other committees. Now, if this precedent is established I would like to ask the gentleman if it would not completely remove that check, and if it would not put it within the power of each committee to prevent any deficiency if it saw fit to do so by getting in a bill——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is possible that is the reason for the proviso. It may have been an unwise thing to have done it, but that is not the question. It is conceded by us that if it is an existing deficiency that then the Committee on Appropriations under the law now, whether that law be wise or unwise, has unquestioned jurisdiction. The point I have been trying to make is this, and one that is absolutely clear to my mind, notwithstanding the efforts of my friend from Kentucky and the speech of the distinguished ex-Speaker of the House, that in determining the question of jurisdiction no sensible body on earth ever went into the merits of the question involved where the question is made upon a mere motion without any intervening ascertainment of facts under the rule and practice of the body in which it was made. Now, it is useless for those gentlemen to talk about submitting estimates. It is senseless to talk about the jurisdiction of this committee if a deficiency exists. The question is, Does it appear from the facts in judgment before this House—and they appear alone on the face of this bill—that there is a deficiency in the department? Is the appropriation for the purpose of meeting a deficiency or for the purpose of increasing the service? Is it for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a deficiency? If it is for the purpose of supplying a deficiency, then the Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction. If the appropriation is sought for the purpose of extending the service, where comes the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations? What authority have they to legislate on postal affairs for the purpose of extension of service? The law does not confer it, and I insist that the House in determining this question shall not seek to go behind the face of this record unless there is presented to it evidence that a deficiency does in fact exist, a fact which I stand here, in view of the information which I have from the department, to most emphatically deny.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he appropriated for the fiscal year 1911–12 $40,000 more for this service than was needed?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. What?

Mr. BURLESON. You are seeking now to take from the money appropriated for the fiscal year 1911–12 $40,000. Did you appropriate $40,000 more than was needed?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think the appropriation next year will probably be $100,000 more than needed.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman admits that he appropriated $100,000 for 1911–12 more than needed——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not admit that I did it. The committee may have.

Mr. BURLESON. I think that is an additional reason——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is a mere judgment, an estimate of ours, and it may be less; I do not know.

Mr. BURLESON. I think that is the reason he has given why jurisdiction of the appropriations should be taken from the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Texas is just like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. They either do not see or can not see the point made in this case. That is all there is about it. It is as clear as can be that, on the question of jurisdiction, the Committee on Appropriations must establish before this House the fact of a legal deficit before it can claim jurisdiction of this bill. They have not done it and they can not do it. I assert again that a deficit can not exist in contemplation of a deficiency. It must be an accomplished fact by actual expenditure of the money appropriated and the unperformed service must still be necessary.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I wish to ask the gentleman whether, if it appeared on the face of the bill that a deficiency actually exists, there would be any question but that this bill would go to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; I think it would.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Then what inference must irresistibly be drawn from the recital on the face of the bill that this sum of $40,000 "shall be immediately available," if there is not a deficiency existing?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly there is no deficiency existing now. But the gentleman certainly understands the proposition that has been advanced, that the House has the right, if it sees fit, to avoid a deficiency. It has got a right to make appropriations to avoid a deficiency, if it wants to, and take into consideration a bill which makes appropriations for the Post Office Department. Whether it be for the regular service or the avoidance of a deficiency in such service, the jurisdiction necessarily remains with the committee which under the statute is declared to have it over all postal matters and the postal service, and the committee claiming that jurisdiction would have to show whether that was so or not. It would have to show that it had the power in advance of an established deficiency to take charge of this bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman says that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has the right to provide against a deficiency?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Very well. Is not this the same proposition stated in more exact terms to provide for a deficiency by appropriating $40,000 more for the current year than is carried in the current bill?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have been answering the gentleman's question as presented, not because the question appealed to me for solution of the issue that is before the House, but because I deemed it to be a question requiring a courteous reply. I have contended and still contend that, as a matter of law, the word "deficiency" has a specific meaning. That meaning is that the appropriation must have been expended for the purpose for which it was made, leaving the work still unaccomplished for which it was made; and until that hour arrives, the Committee on Appropriations has no control or jurisdiction by which it can interfere with postal affairs. I will assert again that that hour has not come in the administration of the postal service.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. COX of Ohio. The gentleman insists that there is not now a deficiency, but admits that one might exist between now and July 1?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. One might exist, and it may be desirable to extend the service.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Then why the necessity of anticipating a deficiency which might arise between now and July 1 when Congress will, in all probability, be in session between now and then?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I see that the gentleman from Ohio is just as confused on that question as other gentlemen. It is not a question of anticipating a deficiency. It is not a question of the merits of the bill we are on. You may be exactly right. It may be altogether improper to make this appropriation. It may be a thing that we ought not to do.

And yet the right to determine that question, so far as a committee is concerned, belongs not to a committee that can not take jurisdiction of it until a deficiency occurs, but belongs to the committee that is clothed and vested at all times with power and jurisdiction over postal affairs and with the making of appropriations for postal affairs until a deficit comes. A deficit has not come, and this House can not hold that the Committee on Appropriations is entitled to consider this bill until it is first determined that there is actually a deficiency in the Post Office Department. When it determines that, it determines it in the face of the truth, because there is no deficiency there now. I do not care whether this bill is a good one or a bad one. The question as to whether the merits of the bill are such as ought to make it appeal to your consideration is not to be considered. I say until there is a declared deficiency, by the expenditure of the money, there is no jurisdiction in the Appropriations Committee.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Tennessee intend to use any more of his time?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I insist that the gentleman use his time, because I will use the balance of the time on this side.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has 10 minutes and the gentleman from New York has 8 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am entitled to close the debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is entitled to close the debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Tennessee is going to use his time, he must use it now.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. How much times does the gentleman want to use in closing the debate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will close the debate.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Go ahead and close the debate if you want to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman waive the balance of his time?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No, I do not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I must insist that the gentleman either use or waive his time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Tennessee will neither use nor waive his time. The Chair will decide what shall be done in the matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I intend to close the debate in one speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York undoubtedly has the right to close the debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am ready to proceed when the gentleman from Tennessee either uses his time or waives his right to time after I have concluded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not determine whether the gentleman from Tennessee shall use his time or not. The rule is:

> The Member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close where general debate has been had thereon.

If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] does not desire to use his time, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will proceed, and the Chair will declare the debate closed.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Tennessee desires to use any more time, I wish him to understand that this is his opportunity.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Let the gentleman from New York proceed as he desires. I have 10 minutes more time. If the gentleman wants to close the debate now, let him close it. I can afford to lose the 10 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not wish to take advantage of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You are not going to take any advantage of me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has just concluded a speech. I am entitled, on this side, to conclude the debate.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman from New York know that if his time is exhausted, and he is entitled to close the debate, the question will arise when he has finished as to whether I am entitled to proceed or not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not wish to indulge in any sharp practice. I want no misunderstanding with the gentleman from Tennessee. If he desires his time, I do not wish him to be foreclosed.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman insists on my speaking again, I suppose I shall have to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not insist on the gentleman's speaking.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment. I do not desire to deprive the gentleman from New York of his right to close the debate. The only question with me was that the gentleman could not make that issue until after he had closed. Then if I sought to speak further, the Chair would prevent it; that is all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not want to put the gentleman in that position. I want to be perfectly frank with him.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman, and I want to say to the Democrats in this House, before the gentleman proceeds, that personally I do not care anything about what committee takes charge of this bill. Personally, I would be altogether willing that any proper committee should take charge of it; but you have seen the manifestation in this debate, the effort that is being made here on the part of the Appropriations Committee to take up this bill, after it had been referred to the Post Office Committee, after it had been considered by the committee, after a report had been ordered by the committee, and prepared and ready to be presented, and only avoided by presenting this question. I feel that we are getting into the same methods, and we are undertaking the same performances that we so much condemned in the gentlemen on the other side.

Why, I have the utmost respect for my distinguished friend, the ex-Speaker of this House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], but it was as natural as anything on this earth could be for him, as a former member and chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and as a former Speaker of this House—and it was also natural for other gentlemen on this side who have not always, in my judgment, been quite as broadly democratic as they ought to be—to take this position. Of course, they want to justify the concentration of power in one committee in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Of course, the gentleman from New York appealed with great success to the gentleman from Illinois to assist him in bridling this Democratic House in the interest of an autocratic committee, as they call the Committee on Appropriations. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, Democrats must have a diffusion of power; if we succeed, we can not concentrate all of the authority and power in this committee, when it clearly appeared that there has been under the facts here stated no legal deficit. Indeed, it would be a poor work on the part of a Democratic House to assume the existence of a fact that does not exist in order to confer jurisdiction and concentrate power where there is already too much power.

Now, I do not desire to make this argument an ad hominum proposition at all, but I show you the reasons for the alliance of the gentleman from New York on this question. He very naturally desires to have more power and authority than he has. Why, of course, if the logic of his position and that of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] were followed, then the whole of the next year's appropriation bill would be a deficiency right now, because the service needs the money, and no money is available for the fiscal year ending 1913. His logic would reach that very conclusion and none other. You can not as men of common sense determine a question of jurisdiction of this sort, when that jurisdiction depends upon the accomplishment of a particular fact, until that fact has been accomplished; and the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations depends upon the existence—not in futuro, but this very minute—of a deficiency in an appropriation for the star-route service.

I do not care what the gentleman may say or think, there is nothing before this House to show the existence of such a deficiency. That bill on its face is one that is competent to be passed upon by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, because it affects and is legislation affecting that department alone, and the only, the one single fact that gives the Appropriations Committee jurisdiction does not exist—the existence of a deficiency. For sensible men to talk about estimates and to talk about what was done in another Congress, what effort was made to take jurisdiction there in a matter of this sort is far wide of the mark. Come down to the single question here presented to the House, and that is the determination of the question of jurisdictional power on the face of the record, and there is no way for you to go behind it. If you did go behind it you would find the existence of facts that deny and prohibit that jurisdiction. That is all that is in it. I may be totally blind, I may be incapable of conceiving the situation, but it never did appear more clear to me than it does this minute that the Committee on Appropriations can not take jurisdiction under the very letter of the law until a deficiency is an accomplished fact and there is no deficiency. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am glad the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has confined the discussion to the merits of the question before the House. Of course I understand his purpose in referring to the attempt of myself in association with the former Speaker to concentrate power in some place or other in this House; but let me say to the gentleman from Tennessee that however much some other Member on this side might have indulged in such a criticism it does not lie in his mouth to do so, because he blindly followed me and the other gentlemen when that question which he has in mind was under consideration. Now, let me dismiss that——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to state that the statement of the gentleman from New York is untrue.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I say that the statement that you make that I blindly followed you at any time is untrue.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I was confident that I should not have yielded to the gentleman. This bill was introduced in the House on Friday, and this is the first time the House has met since that time. The Committee on Appropriations has not been watching the Committee on Post Offices to see what would be done. This motion has been submitted at the earliest time practicable, under the rules, since the bill was introduced.

The gentleman from Tennessee takes the position that until a deficiency actually exists the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction of these estimates. Rarely, if ever, does a deficiency actually exist when the appropriation is made and the estimate is submitted, but the gentleman falls into this error: He states that his committee has authority to appropriate for the support of the service, and for the extension of the service his committee has the power to make the appropriations. This is an annual service and a fixed service. Appropriations for it are made in the annual appropriation bill. Estimates are annually submitted, and Congress in an annual appropriation bill determines in advance the limit of the service. The gentleman's committee appropriated for this fiscal year $7,170,000, although the department requested $7,201,000, $31,000 more than the committee was willing to give the department.

Any suggestion that more money be given for this service for this year is not an original appropriation. It is to carry out the original intent and purpose of the department, and the department has a deficiency which, if it does not now actually exist, is anticipated and will exist later.

Suppose some gentleman introduced a bill appropriating additional money for the support of the Army because of its concentration on our southern border, and took the ground that there was no deficiency actually existing. That bill would belong to the Committee on Military Affairs under the logic of the gentleman from Tennessee. Suppose it is proposed to appropriate money to carry on some branch of the naval service, and because no actual deficiency existed, under similar reasoning that bill would go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Somebody proposes an additional sum be appropriated for the Indian Service, and because the money heretofore appropriated has not been actually expended, that the bill should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Under that theory the Speaker would have referred the communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia asking that more than $10,000 for the contagious-disease fund be made available for personal services for this fiscal year, although at the time the communication came here it appeared on its face that there was $985 still available for expenditure for this year, to another committee than the Committee on Appropriations if some other committee had jurisdiction of the annual appropriations for the District of Columbia. If that were the practice followed——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Has the communication come in yet?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; it has come in.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Let us hear it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If that practice were followed there never would be an estimate for deficiencies, because the same practice would be followed as in this case. Not only would the law be evaded, but the rules of the House would be violated. The gentleman from Tennessee introduced this bill, and it was referred, inadvertently, I believe, to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. He has made the statement that the Postmaster General had written to the two committees, the one of the Senate and the one of the House, asking that this bill be favorably acted upon. Let me read a very salutary rule of the House, Rule XLI:

> Estimates of appropriations and all other communications from the executive departments intended for the consideration of any committees of the House shall be addressed to the Speaker and by him referred as provided by clause 2 of Rule XXIV.

Why addressed to the Speaker? So that they may be printed and all the Members of the House have available the same information that some one gentleman can carry around in his pocket and make public when it suits him to do so.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to suggest to the gentleman, if he will permit, the dates of the introduction of the bill and the consideration of the matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I stated that the bill was introduced last Friday, and this is the first day since then that the House has met, the first day when a motion could be made to correct the reference.

Mr. Speaker, this particular bill is not of such great importance, but unless notice be served on these departments that they can not have some gentleman introduce a bill and evade the spirit of the law and the rules of the House and get all the deficiency appropriations they wish, they will run riot with our appropriations. Think of it! The last Congress was the most extravagant in the history of the Government. Seven million one hundred and seventy thousand dollars was appropriated——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not yield——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. In order that the gentleman may do justice to the Postmaster General——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman declined to yield to me when I attempted to interrupt him.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I yielded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Seven million one hundred and seventy thousand dollars was appropriated for this service, appropriated by the most extravagant Congress in the history of the Government. If this department can go around and evade the law and rules of the House and obtain additional money for the balance of this fiscal year, what do gentlemen think will happen after the 1st of July, when the next appropriations are available? These department chiefs should be held rigidly to the law and be compelled to obey it or suffer the penalty. Otherwise this Congress might just as well shut up shop, and our efforts to economize will be futile, and the appropriations will run far in excess of any made by any other Congress. Now, I have not stated and I do not intend to say anything reflecting on the gentleman's committee. I believe it is a splendid committee. It is merely a question of where these appropriations for deficiencies should be considered. If the provision in this bill were in the annual appropriation bill and in the provision making appropriations for the star-route service for the next fiscal year, if such a provision was contained making immediately available any part of the appropriation for the current fiscal year, it would be stricken out on a point of order because it would be providing for a deficiency, whether the money heretofore appropriated had actually been expended or whether it was in anticipation of the expenditure of the money, because that appropriation would belong to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. Speaker, this matter has now taken that shape where this side of the House should wake up to the fact that if appropriations are to be held within the reasonable limits that we have led the country to expect, it is of the utmost importance that these deficiencies be granted only when the law has been complied with, and that when the law has been violated they shall not be granted unless those responsible for its violation are driven from the public service. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to discharge the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11031 and refer it to the Committee on Appropriations.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOON of Tennessee) there were—ayes 83, noes 43.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the consideration of the bill H. R. 11031, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 52, answered "present" 11, not voting 182, as follows:

SUGAR TRUST INVESTIGATION.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Accounts, I submit the following privileged report (No. 44) on House resolution 184.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 184.

Resolved, That all expenses that may be incurred by the committee appointed under the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted May 8, 1911, to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether there have occurred violations by the American Sugar Refining Co. or other corporations or persons of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, and the acts supplementary thereto, to an amount not exceeding $25,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

The report (by Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution 184, have considered the same and recommend its adoption.

This resolution provides for the payment out of the contingent fund of the House of expenses incurred by the committee appointed to ascertain whether there have been violations of the antitrust act by the American Sugar Refining Co. or other corporations or persons, and the provisions for payment are the same as in House resolution 173 as amended and adopted by the House May 26, 1911, and believing it a proper resolution we recommend its adoption.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. As I caught the reading of this resolution, it is substantially the same as the resolution heretofore passed by the House concerning the steel investigating committee.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the resolution, so far as expenditures are concerned, follows the language of the resolution that was formerly adopted providing for the investigation of the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, these resolutions require the authority of the committee, the approval of the chairman of the committee, and also the approval of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It must be approved by the select committee and also by the Committee on Accounts and attested by the chairman of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question in reference to the Expenditure Committee? I think we passed a resolution some time ago giving to the various Expenditure Committees authority to incur expenses, to be paid out of the contingent fund upon the approval of the chairman of the committee. I ask the gentleman whether there is any control over those matters by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I know of no resolution pertaining to those expenditures, except the resolutions authorizing the several investigations.

Mr. MANN. I think that is correct. There is no resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No resolution from the Committee on Accounts pertaining to such expenditures. Aside from the original resolutions there is nothing.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to say whether the Committee on Accounts has any control over those expenditures in any way whatever? In other words, is there any control by a committee of the House of the expenditures made by the Expenditure Committees, besides the Expenditure Committees themselves?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The Committee on Accounts has this much control over all expenditures: The accounts must be audited by the Committee on Accounts, and where expenditures are made that are unauthorized by previous resolutions they would have absolute control over those expenditures. But where they were within the authority granted to the committee incurring the expense the duty of the Committee on Accounts would be simply to audit and see that they are correct.

Mr. MANN. As I recall the resolution that passed some time ago, it gave to the Committees on Expenditures authority to proceed under the rules in making investigations, to subpœna witnesses, and so forth. Now, who has control over the amount to be expended in the subpœnaing of witnesses by those committees?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will state frankly to the gentleman from Illinois that I understand that would be a matter in the discretion of those committees, or the chairmen thereof. There has been no resolution acted upon by the Committee on Accounts limiting that class of expenditures.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman from Illinois will pardon me, I think I can answer that question. When the Hamlin resolution providing for these investigations by the nine Expenditure Committees for the executive departments was passed, it did not contain any provision whatever about the payment of any expenses.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. HARDWICK. So that no provision has been made for that, except in one instance the House, by a subsequent resolution, did provide for clerks. In the future, when these committees want to get allowances from the contingent fund, they will have to come just as this one does, from the Committee on Accounts. There is no provision at all for it.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. If the Expenditures Committee should summon witnesses and create an expenditure for that purpose, and should send a voucher to the Committee on Accounts, and the Committee on Accounts should approve it, could it not be paid out of the contingent fund?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly. It would depend on the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. GARNER. After all, discretion is left with the Committee on Accounts as to whether they will approve these vouchers.

Mr. MANN. That is what I wanted to ascertain. As I understand, one of the Expenditure Committees has subpœnaed witnesses from the other side of the continent at very great expense. That may be perfectly proper, and I have no criticism to make of it, but I desire to know whether anybody has control over that matter.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the Committee on Accounts has control over the adjustment and the payment of all of these claims.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], as well as to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that this House passed a resolution authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department to go ahead with an investigation and also gave that committee unlimited authority to incur the necessary expense in order to carry forward that investigation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Was that separate from the Hamlin resolution?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. That may be true in that one case.

Mr. MANN. I was not referring to that.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I have served on the Committee on Accounts and also on other committees which have made investigations under resolutions similar to the one now under consideration. The disbursing officer refuses to pay any voucher that is not approved by the chairman of the investigating committee and the Committee on Accounts. He will not pay it until the Committee on Accounts approves it. I have known of a case where a witness stated too much mileage, where the Committee on Accounts has made an investigation and found the fact and refused the bill until modified. I do not understand that the Committee on Accounts would have authority—it might do it arbitrarily—to refuse to pay a witness who had been in attendance if the chairman of the investigating committee certified the amount, but the Committee on Accounts does exercise a supervision over these bills and vouchers after they are certified by the chairman of the investigating committee.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman that my information is that so long as these investigating committees are within the authorization, our obligation is simply to audit and see that the account is correct, but if they incur expenditures outside of the authorization, then we will be under no obligation to allow the expenditures.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield to me to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] contend that the Expenditure Committees have a legal right to make an indebtedness against the Government and to O. K. that voucher and that the disbursing officer would have a right to issue a warrant for it without having the Committee on Accounts consider it?

Mr. OLMSTED. I say that under the practice a disbursing officer would not pay without the approval——

Mr. GARNER. But I am speaking from a legal standpoint. Would the Treasury Department be authorized to pay or would the disbursing officer be authorized to draw a warrant against the Treasury for an indebtedness incurred by one of the Committees on Expenditures unless the Committee on Accounts first had approved it?

Mr. OLMSTED. I doubt if he would have the right, but certainly under the practice he would not do it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the issue raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I desire to say this, that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] introduced a resolution conferring certain extraordinary powers on these nine Expenditure Committees. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules. The Committee on Rules considered it for some time and reported it back to the House. This House passed the resolution as introduced by the gentleman from Missouri. The Committee on Rules did not undertake to deal with the contingent fund of the House, nor did it undertake to confer any authority on any one of these nine committees to incur any expense or to appropriate any money. It was left entirely to the Committee on Accounts to deal with the contingent fund and all expenditures of money necessary in carrying on these investigations by the nine committees. There was no intention——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. In just a moment. There was no intention to take from the Committee on Accounts any jurisdiction that they have under the rules, but we intended, if I may speak of the intentions of any committee when considering matters—we intended to remit all these things to the Committee on Accounts when we reached the question of appropriating money for expenses in carrying on the investigation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: What authority has the Committee on Accounts to audit bills drawing on the contingent fund in the absence of authority being conferred on that committee by resolution?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I say I do not think they have any, except subject to the approval of the House, but whenever the Committee on Accounts brings in a resolution and the House approves it, then, of course, the sanction of the House makes it lawful.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understood the gentleman from Missouri to make the statement that these expenditures or expenses of these several investigating committees, that the vouchers would be approved by the chairmen of the respective committees and then they would be referred to the Committee on Accounts and they would O. K. them, and the disbursing officer would issue a warrant. Now, upon what authority is that done?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Certainly, and therefore the gentleman from Arkansas offers the very resolution we are considering.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The resolution we are considering refers to a special committee, and when that resolution was up I think I asked the gentleman in charge of the bill what they were going to do in regard to expenses, and he said the Committee on Accounts would probably take care of it by a resolution.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And they are taking care of it by a resolution authorizing the expenditure.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But the question raised by the gentleman from Illinois was how the expenditures of these several investigating committees were to be paid, and they are incurring expenses, as is well known.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think that is perfectly clear, that whenever these expenses are incurred they must first be approved by the investigating committee and then must go over to the Committee on Accounts, and they must be O. K.'d there and must have been previously authorized by the House or must be approved subsequently by the House.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In other words, if I understand the gentleman, his position is there must be a resolution of the House authorizing the payment out of the contingent fund of these expenses——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I certainly think so——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield to me I do not think it requires a resolution of the House. The law provides in reference to the payment of expenses out of the contingent fund, and a great many expenses are paid out of the contingent fund that are not provided for by resolution of the House at all. The ordinary expenses of a committee are paid through the contingent fund. The Committee on Accounts has jurisdiction under the law to approve expenditures to be paid out of the contingent fund, and those expenses are paid under the law.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then the gentleman did not catch what I said. I said there must be some sanction of the House at some time before the Committee on Accounts acted.

Mr. MANN. The resolution that was passed which the gentleman referred to that came from his committee gave to committees authority to subpœna witnesses. They have that authority without resolution of the House. There was nothing in the resolution that was passed in reference to the expenditures committees that the committees did not already have, and there was no authority granted, unless it was the one about the Speaker signing subpœnas during the recess, and the question is, Whether such a resolution passed as it was contained anything to give extra authority in incurring expenses or whether the resolution was a mere duplication of existing law in that respect?

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Have they authority to swear witnesses?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; any chairman of a committee can swear a witness.

Mr. GARRETT. Or any Member of the House can swear a witness under the law.

Mr. MANN. The committees have authority under the law.

Mr. GARRETT. I understood the question of the gentleman from Illinois, a few moments ago, to be directed to the matter of the payment of witnesses.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is directed to the matter of the payment of all the expenses incurred by these several committees on expenditures in the executive departments.

Mr. GARRETT. But the gentleman made particular reference to the payment of witnesses.

Mr. MANN. I referred to the pay of witnesses, among other things. Of course, that, as the gentleman knows, is fixed by the rule.

Mr. GARRETT. Neither the Committee on Accounts nor any other committee would have jurisdiction over the payment of witnesses except by some provision of this rule, would it?

Mr. MANN. I think the Committee on Accounts would have jurisdiction to turn down a bill if it thought that one of the other committees of the House was subpœnaing a great number of witnesses without any necessity for it. At least, if I were a member of the Committee on Accounts, I would not vote to approve the bill. I do not charge that that is being done, but that is on the question of authority.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman understand that the pay of witnesses must come out of the contingent fund of the House?

Mr. MANN. I do not.

Mr. GARRETT. I confess that that is a question upon which I have not specific information.

Mr. MANN. It might come out of any other appropriation; but, as a matter of fact, I understand that the payment of witnesses does actually come out of the contingent fund, because there is no other appropriation made for that purpose.

Mr. GARRETT. But no special resolution is necessary to fix the pay of witnesses, there being the standing rules of the House on that subject.

Mr. MANN. Not to fix the amount.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, as to the appropriation for it, that would be like any other matter that the House would provide for. It must be appropriated.

Mr. MANN. Well, we generally aim to provide some check on the expenditure of money beyond the ones who want the money. Now, a committee might want to expend money that the committee in charge of the money might not want to have expended. I mean no reflection on either committee.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] has charge of the time.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Illinois just a moment ago remarked that it was customary for the House to put a check upon some of those who wanted to spend the money. I would like the gentleman to point out any resolution that has been passed in the last eight years authorizing an investigation where a check was placed on it by his side of the House?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants a specific instance I will give him one. When the special committee on the pulp and paper investigation was authorized by resolution there was a check on it.

Mr. GARNER. In what way?

Mr. MANN. All accounts had to be approved by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. GARNER. That was an exception to the rule.

Mr. MANN. No; it was not an exception at all. I think I followed the rule simply.

Mr. GARNER. It happened to be one of the committees where no check was needed, the gentleman from Illinois being at the head of it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield further?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I merely want to state what the standing law is on the subject.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I submit that this discussion is entirely foreign to the resolution under consideration. I yield to the gentleman in order that he may ask a question.

Mr. OLMSTED. The question has been asked, What is the law authorizing the Committee on Accounts to pass upon such accounts? I think the only law is found in the rules of this House fixing the powers and duties of committees—Rule XI—which begins by saying that "all proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the succeeding paragraphs," and in the forty-eighth paragraph it says, on page 354:

> Touching the expenditure of the contingent fund of the House, the auditing and settling of all accounts which may be charged therein by order of the House—to the Committee on Accounts.

Now, strictly interpreted, that rule, considering the language at the beginning and the opening of the forty-eighth paragraph, would mean all proposed legislation touching those things, but the remaining language of the forty-eighth paragraph clearly means to confer on the Committee on Accounts the auditing and settling of all accounts. That is, all charges against the contingent fund of the House are to be audited by the Committee on Accounts. I would not go so far as to say that that means that the Committee on Accounts might properly say that some investigating committee had summoned more witnesses than it needed to have summoned and therefore it would not pay the witness fees. That, perhaps, would be an arbitrary exercise of power. But in any event no account can very well be paid until it is approved by the Committee on Accounts, and should it find any irregularities it would doubtless withhold its approval.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BARTLETT). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mention has been made here of the contingent fund of the House. Is the contingent fund of the House a fixed sum? Is it an established amount?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It is appropriated for in the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it carried as a fixed sum from year to year?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think not.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman know what the present state of that fund is?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The Committee on Appropriations recommend whatever amount is deemed necessary every year.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman know the amount of the contingent fund at present?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I can not advise the gentleman as to the amount now in the fund.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman know what we have expended yearly in the past?

Mr. CARLIN. That can be ascertained at any time by calling upon the disbursing officer.

Mr. MANN. Last year, I think, it was about $75,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Illinois says about $75,000.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think it is usually about $75,000 per annum.

This discussion has been entirely foreign to this resolution. The only resolutions which have come to the Committee on Accounts relating to the expenditures of committees are the one which we passed a few days ago, authorizing the select committee to investigate the United States Steel Corporation to make certain expenditures, and this resolution now under consideration, to authorize the select committee to investigate the American Sugar Refining Co. to make certain expenditures. These are the only resolutions that have been considered by the Committee on Accounts.

The other resolutions passed by the House, as I construe and understand them, authorize unlimited expenditures. But your Committee on Accounts sought to adopt a different policy and to fix a limit on the expenditures of these special investigating committees. We fixed that limit at $25,000 in the former resolution, and we fixed it at $25,000 in this resolution. If that sum should not prove sufficient, we stand ready to give more in the future; but we believe it wise to put a check upon these expenditures, so that the auditing committee, the Committee on Accounts, will know from time to time what expenditures are being made. Now, this resolution, as already stated, conforms in every respect to the resolution that we adopted a few days ago authorizing expenditures by the select committee to investigate the Steel Trust. It provides that there shall be a double authorization; in the first place, that the select committee must authorize the expenditure, then that the Committee on Accounts must audit and approve the vouchers, and the chairman of the Committee on Accounts must sign and attest the authorization. We think this resolution is right and proper, and if no one else desires to be heard on the question, or to ask any further questions, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ARREST OF JOHN J. M'NAMARA.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report (No. 46) from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules has had under consideration House concurrent resolution 6, providing for the appointment of a committee of investigation, and report that they have held hearings, at which the proponents and all others desiring to be heard appeared and gave testimony. In the opinion of your committee——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Are we not entitled to have the resolution reported first, so that the House may know what the report is about?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the resolution.

Mr. MANN. But the Clerk is reading the report of the committee. We do not know what it is about.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman may take it either way. We are going to have the resolution read, and the report also.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk is directed to read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 6.

Whereas the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution ordains that no State shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws"; and

Whereas it is reported in the public press that one John J. McNamara, heretofore residing in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., has been deprived of liberty and put in jeopardy of his life without due process of law: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a committee of each House be appointed to investigate the arrest and extradition of the said McNamara, and to report its findings to the two Houses at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I now ask that the report be read.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that this report is not privileged.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think that a report from the Committee on Rules is privileged.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve the point of order until I can hear what it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Rules has had under consideration House concurrent resolution 6, providing for the appointment of a committee on investigation, and report that they held hearings at which the proponent and all others desiring to be heard appeared and gave testimony. In the opinion of your committee it covered all the material facts that could be elicited by a select committee and further investigation would throw no additional light on the transaction and it is therefore unnecessary. The testimony is herewith submitted for the information of the House with a view of determining whether or not further legislation is necessary. It is recommended that House concurrent resolution 6 do lie on the table.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois does not care to discuss the point of order——

Mr. MANN. I think I will discuss the point of order for a moment. As I understand the resolution, it is a concurrent resolution providing that a committee of each House shall be appointed to investigate the arrest and extradition of McNamara and report its findings to the two Houses at the earliest practicable moment.

Apparently it is not contemplated to appoint one committee, although it says that it shall report its findings. It provides for a committee of each House. It provides that the House shall appoint a committee and the Senate shall appoint a committee. I have no objection myself to the appointment of a committee by the House, but I question, there being no joint rules in existence, whether the House has anything to say about the appointment of a Senate committee, or whether the Senate has anything to say about the appointment of a House committee; and if the House has nothing to say about the Senate committee, then the Committee on Rules has no jurisdiction to report, as a privileged matter, a resolution providing for the appointment of a Senate committee on anything. Nor do I think the Committee on Rules has jurisdiction to report a concurrent resolution asking the permission of the Senate for the House to appoint a House committee. The Committee on Rules has jurisdiction over the rules and over the order of the business of the House and over joint rules. But here is a resolution proposing, not a joint committee of the two bodies, not that the House shall appoint a House committee, but proposing that we ask permission of the Senate that we appoint a House committee and give to the Senate permission to appoint a Senate committee. That is the purpose of the resolution as it looks to me.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. I will say to the gentleman that I never saw the resolution before.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course the objections the gentleman is making go to the form of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. I think it goes to the jurisdiction of the committee in reference to it.

Mr. GARRETT. The jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules?

Mr. MANN. I have no objection, the gentleman understands, to considering the real proposition.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, if it would be reported to the House with a recommendation for passage, then the matter of form would become important; but being reported to the House with a recommendation that it lie upon the table, how can the form be important? Why should the committee amend the resolution and then report that it do lie upon the table?

Mr. MANN. I am frank to say that I did not hear what the report was.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think we can agree without any trouble about it. I am not defending the form of the resolution at all. The point is simply this, that a resolution for an investigation was introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] providing for a certain kind of committee. Whether he aptly shaped it or not we are not now considering. The Committee on Rules did consider his resolution and report it to the House, with a recommendation that it lie upon the table, but in advance of making the formal motion, it is my intention to ask unanimous consent that the testimony taken by the Committee on Rules, which is all the material evidence that can be adduced on the subject, and the accompanying report be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in order that such committee may inquire whether or not further legislation is necessary in regard to the extradition laws. The gentleman from Wisconsin so understands the matter, and later I shall ask that this testimony go to the Judiciary Committee and that his resolution do lie upon the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, of course the reason I made the point of order, and I did not understand what the purpose of the gentleman was in making the report, was simply on the question of the resolution being privileged in the House. The House guards very carefully and properly so privileged reports, and the question whether reports are privileged, because when a committee reports a bill which is privileged it thrusts out of the way everything else, but with the explanation which the gentleman has made I shall withdraw the point of order merely because I would not object to the unanimous consent.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I was going to say that, while not waiving the point, I believe the resolution is strictly privileged; yet I will not offer it as a privileged resolution, but ask unanimous consent that the resolution and report be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas withdraws the resolution as a privileged resolution, and now asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution and report. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to differ with the gentleman from Illinois as to the character of this resolution. I see it now for the first time. I was unavoidably absent when the matter was considered by the committee, and had not read the resolution until now. I concur, of course, in the conclusion that was arrived at by the committee after discussion.

I think the resolution as presented by the committee now is an eminently proper one and brings about the result that was desired in a much better way than it would have been by the appointment of a special committee. Nevertheless, I think this is a privileged resolution. It relates to the business of the House. It calls for the appointment of a committee to deal in a special way with a matter that belongs to the House, and while it is true that the appointment of that committee eventually would depend upon the consent of the Senate, nevertheless it is strictly a resolution dealing with the business of the House, and I am not willing to agree that the resolution in its present shape is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not waive that point. It is only to have an agreement that unanimous consent is now asked.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not object to the gentleman's attitude, but I wanted to express my own view.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand that this appoints one committee, or a committee of the House and also a committee of the Senate?

Mr. DALZELL. The resolution as it reads seems to contemplate the appointment of two committees.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that it would be privileged in the House for the Committee on Rules to report a resolution providing that the Senate shall appoint a committee of investigation?

Mr. DALZELL. I think it is entirely competent for the House to report a resolution creating a committee of its own to act with a committee of the Senate, if the Senate sees fit to agree.

I do not see how the privilege is destroyed by the fact that it requires the consent of the Senate to call the matter into final execution.

Mr. MANN. True, but that is not the question as to the privilege——

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARLIN. I make the point of order that the matter the gentlemen are discussing is not before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CARLIN. The Chair does not understand the point of order——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, first I ask unanimous consent that both testimony and report, which are printed, the testimony being appended to the report, be referred to the Commitee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the testimony accompanying this report from the Committee on Rules be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so referred.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that House resolution No. 6 do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Texas is that the pending resolution be laid on the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report (No. 47) from the Committee on Rules and ask that the resolution be read first.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 154——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Clerk to suspend. Now, there is an original resolution and we have reported a substitute. I will ask if the gentleman from Illinois desires the original resolution and the substitute both to be read? I think the reading of the substitute will be sufficient.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The original resolution will first have to be read and then the substitute unless dispensed with.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the original resolution be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the substitute may be read in lieu of the original resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is this the substitute to House resolution 154?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; it is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not been able to procure a copy of the substitute.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The substitute, of course, has not been printed, but I will have it read in one moment, and I will give the gentleman all the time he wants to interrogate in regard to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the gentleman's request is that the substitute be read in lieu of the original resolution?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, or any subcommittee thereof which may be appointed by the chairman of said committee for that purpose, be authorized to send for and to compel the production of such books and papers and the presence of such persons as they may deem necessary for the purpose of inquiring into the operations and methods of the departments of assessment and collection of taxes of the District of Columbia and such other departments of the District of Columbia as may be determined by them, and, as well, the organization, capitalization, bonded and other indebtedness, management, and conduct of any and all of the public-utility corporations doing business in the said District. Said committee or subcommittee is hereby given authority to administer oaths. Said committee or subcommittee may sit during the sessions of Congress or during the recesses between sessions of the Sixty-second Congress for this purpose.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I now desire that the report be read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the point of order on the resolution as being privileged until we can hear the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order as to the character of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. We ought to have a chance to see about it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the gentleman will permit me, at one time I tried to give him and the House the opportunity of seeing these reports, and he made the point of order that the Committee on Rules must report from the floor and have the resolution and report read at the Clerk's desk. Theretofore I had filed some of them in order that they must be printed as other resolutions and committee reports, which is competent under the rules, in order that the Members might consult them, but the gentleman made the point that the Committee on Rules had no authority to make reports in that way. Although I do not agree with the gentleman [Mr. MANN], for I think the Committee on Rules can report in either way under the rules.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman making a privileged report, as the gentleman from Alabama did this morning, having it reported before it is called up in the House.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman knows that the authority conferred on the Committee on Rules or on any other committee to present a privileged report carries the authority to immediately consider it.

Mr. MANN. It carries with it that authority.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think we can agree about that. There is no controversy about the resolution.

Mr. MANN. I think, likely. I reserved the point of order until I could examine the substitute. The substitute appears to be quite different from the original.

Mr. DALZELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he wait until he hears the report read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HENRY of Texas, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following report:

"The Committee on Rules have had under consideration House resolution 154, authorizing the Committee on the District of Columbia to inquire into the government of said District, and report in lieu thereof the accompanying resolution as a substitute, and recommend its adoption."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there is no controversy about this resolution, and I hope there will be none about the report. The Committee on Rules thought amendments to the resolution were necessary in two particulars. First, there was a clause in the original resolution to the effect that if any witness summoned before the committee on the District of Columbia should swear falsely he should be punished as for perjury. Of course we know that under the law a witness so summoned could be punished for perjury without putting that authority in the resolution, and therefore we struck it out as surplusage. Then, in the second place, toward the end of the resolution there was verbiage dealing with the expenditures in regard to this resolution. The committee thought proper not to try to deal with the contingent fund of the House or any expense or expenditures in regard to this matter, but preferred to submit all of those questions to the Committee on Accounts, so that they might pass under their scrutiny, and therefore we pretermitted that language as being improper. I might say, because, as the gentleman will agree, a point of order would lie against that part of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason why I reserved a point of order, because it does lie.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is the reason we struck it out.

Mr. MANN. It still lies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. It is the original resolution that is before the House.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not think so. I think we can report a substitute to the House as an independent proposition from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has given away his case. However, that is neither here nor there.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. But we can vote on both.

Mr. MANN. I merely made the point of order on account of the substitute.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will sustain the point of order to the original resolution.

Mr. MANN. There is no controversy then. The gentleman proposes to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of his privileged resolution.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the gentleman and I can agree I will certainly ask unanimous consent to consider it, although I think the substitute and report privileged. Yet I am willing to bring the matter before the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman and I agree that if the original resolution is subject to a point of order, then the substitute is also subject to a point of order. It is the original resolution that is before the House. It is the original resolution that is reported to the House, with the proposed amendment substituted by the committee, and the point of order lies to the original resolution, and the original resolution is the test.

But let me ask the gentleman, What is the part that is inserted in the resolution in the substitute? What is the scope of that?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The scope of that is only inserting a new clause authorizing the committee to inquire into the operations and methods of the department of assessment and collection of taxes of the District of Columbia, specifically including those things for the committee to investigate.

Mr. MANN. Would not that be covered by inquiring into the operation of the government of the District of Columbia?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Perhaps it would be, but the committee, out of an abundance of caution, thought it better to specify this particular subject of inquiry.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman one question, merely as to a matter of form. Does not the gentleman think it would be a little better form to strike out the word "House" before "Committee"?

Resolved, That the "House" Committee on the District of Columbia——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes. That is a typographical error. We will agree on that.

Mr. MANN. We instruct our own Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARRETT. Is the word "House" in the substitute?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It is in the substitute, but it is a mere error in copying. I take the responsibility for its being there, although I did not copy it.

Mr. MANN. I understand. That probably would not strike everybody, but I think that is not the proper title of the committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is not a very serious thing.

Mr. MANN. It might be if you got into a controversy over the subpœnaing of witnesses.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, if we have finished these substantial technicalities, I should like to ask if any gentleman desires to discuss the resolution.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to enter into any discussion, but I should like a little information from the chairman. Do I understand that the substitute eliminates from the original resolution an investigation of the operation of the government of the District of Columbia, and of the management and conduct of public-utility corporations doing business in the District, as contemplated by the original resolution, 154?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; it does not. It includes that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the substitute does include the investigation of those two subjects?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. With the added investigation of the subjects of the bonded liability of the District and assessment and taxation?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It does.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And their relation to the General Government?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman if he is able to tell us about how far this investigation is to go in the matter of expense? Has the matter of the expense of the investigation been considered at all?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It has. It has been my intention to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia; and his statement, as I remember it, was that this investigation ought not to cost more than $2,500—certainly not to exceed $5,000. We considered the question thoroughly, and although that question will go to the Committee on Accounts, I think it is a proper thing for the Committee on Rules to consider as well.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that this investigation is so wide in its scope and is capable of being prolonged to such an extent, by reason of the nature of the subjects to be inquired into, that it might be advisable to fix some limit of cost.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The Committee on Accounts will undoubtedly fix a limit.

Mr. POU. If the gentleman from Texas will allow me, I want to say that the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia stated that he would have no objection to putting a limit of $5,000 on the cost of the investigation.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And, furthermore, the Committee on Rules considered the proposition and thought it better that the whole subject dealing with the expenditures should go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have had no conference with the District of Columbia Commissioners, although my understanding is that they have no objection to an inquiry of this kind. But we are in the summer months, and the addition to your original resolution of the proposition to investigate the method of assessment and taxation is so large that it is a question when we would get through with it. However, if the gentleman thinks that the expense would not be more than $5,000, it seems to me that there can be no objection to that amount.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it contemplated that the cost of this investigation shall come from the contingent fund of the House?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Personally, I think so, although it might be ordered from some other fund if the House should choose.

Mr. GARRETT. With the permission of the gentleman from Texas, I want to say that the Committee on Rules is setting an example to the House of observing strictly the rules of the House, and therefore it is not dealing with the matter of expense. The gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee and the Committee on Accounts can deal with that matter.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman how many investigating committees have been authorized by the Committee on Rules?

Mr. GARRETT. Two special committees.

Mr. BURLESON. At $25,000 each?

Mr. GARRETT. Not to exceed that.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman will understand that the appropriation made for the contingent fund for the fiscal year amounts to only $75,000. One or two more committees and we will have a deficit in the contingent fund.

Mr. GARRETT. This is not a special committee; this is one of the regular committees of the House.

Mr. BURLESON. I think it is well enough for the Committee on Rules to understand that the contingent fund amounts to only $75,000 a year.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Texas will understand that the Committee on Rules did not fix the amount of the expenditure with reference to the other special committees.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let me suggest to the gentleman that the contingent fund may soon be exhausted, but that is on account of the extraordinary session, which increases the expense, and there is always a deficiency where we have three sessions instead of two during a Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This resolution provides that "the House Committee on the District of Columbia, or any subcommittee thereof which may be appointed by the chairman of said committee"; that is to say, the whole Committee on the District of Columbia may enter into this investigation, or a subcommittee to be appointed by the chairman may enter into it. Would it not affect somewhat the question of cost if the entire committee was to serve as inquisitors?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It might; but the idea the committee had in mind was that the Committee on the District of Columbia might take charge of that matter and select whatever subcommittee it thought appropriate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The resolution leaves it to the discretion of the chairman of the committee to make this appointment, and if he sees fit, to delegate it to the entire committee.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That would be subject to the approval of the committee.

Mr. OLMSTED. But it does not say so.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I take it that the chairman of the District Committee would desire the sanction of the committee when he undertakes to make an appointment of that sort, and there would be no conflict of jurisdiction about it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And even with that question raised and considered the gentleman thinks the cost would be somewhere between $2,500 and $5,000 to complete the investigation?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Undoubtedly, I think so.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman something about this expenditure. Under this substitute resolution this committee on investigation can hold sessions between the regular sessions of Congress. That is, this committee on investigation can be in Washington when Congress is not in session. Now, if the members of this committee, scattered abroad over the country, are brought into the city of Washington to hold a session of the committee, are they allowed mileage out of the contingent fund as expenses?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. They are not allowed extra mileage, and the gentleman must understand that those matters would come under the scrutiny of the "11 watchdogs of the Treasury"—the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MURDOCK. They would not be permitted mileage?

Mr. MANN. They would be allowed their expenses.

Mr. MURDOCK. They would be allowed their expenses?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does the gentleman mean the members of the committee?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Undoubtedly they would not be allowed extra mileage.

Mr. OLMSTED. They certainly would.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. What authority would the Committee on Accounts have to allow an additional compensation to a Member of Congress in the performance of his duty during a session of Congress or during a recess of Congress? It might allow his expenses.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then the expenses of this committee would be confined largely to the expenses of a stenographer.

Mr. RUSSELL. And witness fees.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; witness fees. And our idea is, perhaps, the stenographers already provided for could take all the testimony.

Mr. MANN. Why should there be any expenses for stenographers, when we have 10 stenographers who are not working during vacation?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have just made that suggestion in accordance with the gentleman's idea.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has just added by his substitute an investigation of the system of taxation in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me say to the gentleman that that is one of the most fruitful fields of inquiry that any committee of Congress could enter upon, and it would unquestionably involve a consideration of the taxation systems prevailing in other large cities of the country. Might it not be necessary, if this Congress is to expect a complete and thorough report looking to a revision of the entire system in the District of Columbia, for the committee to visit various other cities, or would it have to depend wholly upon reports that might be forwarded to it?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It might be necessary, and still that would be under the direction of the District Committee and the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman mean that during the recess, should there be one, and the committee sits during the recess, will the expenses of the committee, such as board and lodging in the District of Columbia, be charged up as a part of the expense of the committee?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Why, no; I take the view that the members can be allowed no extra compensation, but only actual expenses.

Mr. SIMS. I thought that what the gentleman said left that impression, and I wanted to remove it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD]. This House, and in fact the entire country, has been hearing for years and years that there are irregularities in the affairs of the District of Columbia. Whether there are or not can not be ascertained without an investigation. If there has been any sort of mismanagement or extravagance in the affairs of the District of Columbia, the Congress is entitled to know it, that it may be remedied. If there have not been any irregularities, if through these thirty-odd years there has been no misappropriation of funds, no wastefulness of the public money, then the country ought to be quieted with the report of a competent committee that such is the fact. This unrest among the people and among the Members of Congress should be stopped or they should be given something to complain about. As for myself, I have said from the beginning that I knew of nothing fraudulent, but that I was informed, from what I deemed reliable sources, that through error or through a system of auditing, the Federal Government had paid more than its share of the 50 per cent basis on which we are operating, that 50 per cent basis being that the Government of the United States should pay one-half of the current expenses of the District of Columbia and the District of Columbia pay the other half of the current expenses. While this matter was up before the Committee on Rules I had occasion to say that I had been informed reliably, as I believed, that the Federal Government had paid more than half, and I cited one instance of the interest on the 3.65 per cent bonds, and on the bonds themselves, contending that the Government was not bound to pay any interest whatever on those bonds, but that the Government had bound itself to have taxes levied in the District of Columbia which would produce sufficient revenue that the District might pay the interest on those bonds.

It developed that the interest on those bonds fell due each year just at a time when the District was without funds. Then the act was amended and the Government was directed to advance a sum of money sufficient to enable the District to pay this interest when it was due and not wait until after the taxes coming to the District of Columbia had been collected. Now, my contention that the Government is bound only as a guarantor of this interest and is not in any sense bound to pay this interest can be found in an act passed in 1877, which reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall reserve of any of the revenues of the District of Columbia not required for the actual current expenses of schools, the police, and the fire department, a sum sufficient to meet the interest accruing on the three-sixty-five bonds of the District during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1877, and apply the same to that purpose; and in case there shall not be a sufficient sum of said revenues in the Treasury of the United States at such time as said interest may be due, then the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to advance, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to pay said interest, and the same shall be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States from time to time as said revenues may be paid into said Treasury until the full amount shall have been refunded.

Now, as I said, I am advised that this refunding from time to time which was contemplated by this act has not been made. I am not a bookkeeper, I am not an accountant, and it is my opinion that no member of the District Committee is such, therefore we have deemed it advisable to ask this House to give us an accountant, that he may go and see whether or not the United States Government has been reimbursed to the extent which it should have been through these long years. In other words, this partnership has existed for nearly a third of a century without this question having been inquired into, as far as I can find. I believe that an accountant can be obtained for less than $5,000 who will go through this. All it requires is the appropriation acts of each session and then compare them to the auditor's report, and, as to the rest of the work, the members of that committee are more than willing, they assure me, and I assure you that I myself am just as willing, to go into whatever part of it that we can without a cent of expense to the Government.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question right there? In case Congress adjourns and this committee has to remain here and incur expenses that otherwise would not be required of them——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Most willingly.

Mr. SIMS. Are they not in justice entitled to such expenses as are incurred in that particular investigation just the same as if they were taken off to some other city to make that investigation? Are they not entitled to that as a matter of justice?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say this, I do not believe we are entitled to it. I do not want it and would not accept it, and I have not heard an expression from a single member of the committee who disagrees with me on that point.

Mr. SIMS. It is very generous on your part. I think you are entitled to it as a matter of equity if you have to stay here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If we can have this done by December, and can find something to report to you, so well and good. If we can find nothing, then I say that all this clamor should be stopped. Now, in the beginning, when this resolution was first offered, the newspapers here took it up and in great headlines and in double-faced type they undertook to make it appear that this investigation was one that would lead us back of the Shepherd régime, and, consequently, it was such a monumental piece of work that it should not be undertaken.

But now, believing that Congress is going to authorize the undertaking of this work, they begin to minimize it and say, in substance, that it is of no consequence. In the papers either of to-day or yesterday afternoon—I forget which—we find a statement that this discrepancy in refunding the debt of the United States would amount to only three or four thousand dollars. What I did say before that committee was that it amounted to between three and four hundred thousand dollars a year, if there is any discrepancy at all.

Mr. SIMS. To several million dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And to repeat, if I were given the books, I could not do the work. I am not an accountant. If the books were turned over to the committee, so far as my observation goes, there is not a man there qualified to do it. I believe all we want is one accountant and possibly a stenographer during a part of the time to go through with this.

Now, I would not go into the question as to the attitude of newspapers respecting this matter except for the fact that the newspapers may perhaps have biased the judgment of Members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. While the hearing was going on before the Rules Committee one gentleman asked me for what purpose these bonds had been issued. I said to pay the fraudulent certificates which had been issued under the Shepherd régime, when the District of Columbia had charge of her own affairs and when Congress did not have charge of her affairs as now.

To read from a report filed before Congress at that time, when the commission form of government was being proposed to succeed that prior form of government under which perhaps $25,000,000 had just then been misappropriated, this language occurs and this prophecy was made as to the new form of government:

> The governor and board of public works have seized all the elements of power in this District. They have laid their hands upon all the organized forces of the community; they have captured every source of influence, public and private; they have dictated the conduct of the press, controlled the legislature, and manipulated the courts; they have demanded the irresponsible disbursement of the public funds; they have secured the arbitrary appointment of all officials, high and low; they have cultivated congressional committees; they have debauched public servants; they have surrounded the President; they have patronized the rowdy element; they have intimidated the primary assemblages of the people; they have packed political meetings; they have conspired to overthrow political organizations; they have imposed their candidates upon the people and driven voters to their support through threats of starvation; they have suppressed freedom of speech in the District of Columbia and made liberty of political action an offense; they have seduced the wealthy, tyrannized over the poor, ostracized the honest, and persecuted the independent; they have retained the leading members of the bar, subsidized the churches, and schemed for the control of the school and charitable funds; they have sought the power of appointment of judges to be the ministers and have made the police the agents of their will; they have organized a militia establishment on the basis of an Army corps.

This grave indictment, if anywise true, of the late governing power of the District becomes at once a lesson and a prophecy when it is contemplated to vest still broader powers upon the commissioners than those conferred upon the governor and board of public works.

At that time, when changing from that form of government to that we now have, we find Mr. Townsend, of Illinois, using this language:

> Now, Mr. Speaker, in an investigation which afterwards took place, of which Senator Allison was chairman, the officers and employees of the board of public works were brought before the committee and were examined on oath. I have here the figures which Mr. Oertley, the engineer of the District, swore were the amounts charged against the Federal Government, in which investigation he stated that the sum charged against the Federal Government and collected for this improvement on the same six blocks of New York Avenue was $83,187.02.
> At another time the same Mr. Oertley, the engineer of the board of public works, states in his sworn testimony, on page 2293 of the report, that there had been collected from the Federal Government for the improvement of these six blocks on New York Avenue the sum of $99,028.85. Although these parties made three different statements of the cost of this particular work, yet it will be seen that there was charged against the Federal Government and collected from the National Treasury $84,088.90 more than the board of public works in their official report, sent to Congress under the sanction of the President of the United States, declared was required to be paid by the Government for this improvement. It also appears that the board charged and collected from the owners of private property abutting on the street and from the General Government, etc., $19,000 more than the entire cost of the improvement, and in addition thereto the sum of $67,219.74 was charged to the general fund and is embraced in the funded 3.65 bonds. Thus the board of public works received in all $207,640.42 for an improvement which only cost, according to its own report, $123,552.26. What became of the excess collected over and above the cost of the work?
> Having collected from the General Government and private citizens, etc., they proceeded and did file against the general fund of this District a claim for this improvement of over $67,000, which has been funded into 3.65 bonds. These are the figures in regard to a portion of a single street in this city; and it is a sample of the charges for improvement on many if not all the other streets.
> Facts like these have caused me to rise in my seat and protest against the passage of this bill containing the section to which I refer until some satisfactory explanations are made in this House. Persons familiar with the facts in regard to these matters will tell you that a very large part of the amount funded into the 3.65 bonds is a fraud upon the taxpayers of the District, and that if we pledge the National Government to the payment of the sum already funded, we will fasten a fraudulent debt upon the National Treasury to the extent of the amount included in these 3.65 bonds.

I should not have mentioned this, gentlemen of the House, except for the newspaper accounts, which, whether intended to be so or not, are misleading. They say that I said that these bonds were fraudulent. I have never said that, because I know these bonds are good and binding; but what I have said is that, perhaps year after year, for nearly a third of a century, you have been paying half of the interest on these bonds when it was never your debt. You perhaps have been paying half of the principal of these millions of bonds when it was never your debt.

To go into that, and to go into other things of equal importance, this resolution has been introduced, and I earnestly hope it will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it has occurred to me, and possibly to a good many of the Members who were here in the Sixty-first Congress, when charges were made upon the floor of this House that there were inequalities in the assessment of property in the District of Columbia. I have had occasion to look into this matter a little, have had some evidence on this point, and when this resolution came before the Committee on Rules I felt that if an investigation of the affairs of the District of Columbia was had it ought to include in it the important matter of the assessments and taxation in this District.

I believe that we have upon that committee now—not that there have not been in the past—men who have taken a great deal of interest in municipal affairs, and that whatever is wrong in these assessments and methods of taxation will be corrected by proper laws when the question is investigated and looked into by the District Committee.

I believe that there is inequality of taxation in the District of Columbia that ought to be looked into and that ought to be corrected. I believe that there are many abuses that this Congress should correct by proper legislation. I have no doubt in my mind that there are many people in the District of Columbia who have large holdings of real estate who to-day are not paying their just proportion of taxation, and that the man who lives in his little home and is a small property holder is paying more than his just proportion.

So I am glad that this investigation is to be brought about, and I believe next winter, when this Congress meets in regular session, if it gets away before that time, we shall have the opportunity of correcting these abuses that have grown up here from year to year and that have been brought about by a lot of real estate sharks and tax dodgers in the District of Columbia. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to discuss the resolution, but I want to make a suggestion in reference to the statements made by the chairman of the Committee on Rules in answer to an inquiry propounded by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], because I think it ought to be stated. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] inquired of the gentleman from Texas, chairman of the Committee on Rules, whether in his opinion a member of a committee coming here during the recess, called here from his home or elsewhere, to engage in work authorized by the House, could secure any compensation for coming. I understood the gentleman from Texas to reply that he could not. If that be limited to a matter of compensation, of course the gentleman from Texas is correct, but I understand that, under the law and the practice and rules, any member of a special or a regular committee who during recess travels anywhere to engage in investigation or in the work of the House is entitled to his actual traveling and living expenses during that time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the gentleman from Tennessee will pardon me——

Mr. GARRETT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from Kansas asked me a question and I gave him a categorical answer. He asked whether a Member serving on a committee during a recess was entitled to extra mileage. I said he was not. I did not say that a Member of Congress would not be entitled to have his expenses paid on these investigation committees, or the various commissions that have been organized and upon which Members and Senators have been placed. As I understand it, frequently their expenses are paid out of the fund put at the disposal of the committee. I did not mean to imply that the expenses of the Members when going to some other place, for instance, Philadelphia, would not be paid out of the fund. What I did mean to say was that no extra mileage could be allowed.

Mr. GARRETT. I was sure that that was what the gentleman meant, but some gentlemen misunderstood his remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me——

Mr. GARRETT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say that, in so far as I am advised, there will be no occasion for the summoning of witnesses outside of the District of Columbia; that all the information we want can be gotten right here. That is my belief about the matter.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for me to ask a question of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In reference to the statement the gentleman just made that no witnesses would be called from outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I said that so far as I was concerned.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that if this committee goes into the subject of assessment and taxation it is likely to call witnesses from many places; that is, if it goes into the subject exhaustively?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say frankly and freely to the gentleman, that I believe all the information we want can be obtained on that subject from correspondence. I want to be understood now that I will not favor, but shall strenuously oppose, the traveling of a single mile outside the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. I have a great deal of confidence, not only in the District Committee, but especially in its chairman and in his disposition to be fair and economical, and I have no doubt that he will pursue that course if he be allowed to do so, and I hope he will be allowed to do so.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I understand the law and the practice to be in regard to the payment of expenses of special committees that where during the recess Members travel they are entitled to the actual traveling expenses and to their living expenses while in town or city or place in which they may be working.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, my interest in this question arises because of my membership in the Committee on the District of Columbia. I have not heard the rumors of mismanagement and improper government upon the part of those now directing affairs in the District of Columbia to which the chairman of the committee has referred. Occasional comments have appeared in the newspapers, and now and then we have been told that taxation was unfair in the District; that the rich property owner had an advantage over the poor property owner, and that the property owner in general had some advantage over the property owner outside of the District of Columbia. But these have been newspaper reports.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I said in my remarks before the Committee on Rules, and I wish to repeat it here, that I have not the slightest reason to question the probity of the present members or the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. I did say, however, then, and I repeat it now, that the commissioners spend all the money. They appoint their own auditor, and I believe that it is nothing more than a business proposition that somebody else go through these accounts. The law puts them under bonds of $50,000 each. For what purpose? For the purpose that they were willing to trust them no further than we are. And now, if this were a private business enterprise in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I were interested, each of us would want the accounts of the other investigated, especially when the sums of money spent run up into the millions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am very glad the gentleman has made that statement, and I concede his sincerity in desiring this investigation. I do not understand him to question the integrity of the present commissioners. That is clear, and he has made it clear, but he has suggested here a resolution which proposes an investigation for reasons that have not been fully set out to the House except by indirection, and he has read extracts from ancient publications. The fact that "Boss" Shepherd once held sway here and came back an honored man, perhaps, has very little to do with the question now. If there is anything wrong with the government of the District of Columbia, of course Congress, which is responsible for the appropriations, ought to know about it. But I was observing that except as a comment appears here and there in a newspaper, or a grievance arises from some one in the employ of the government, who seems to be dissatisfied with his place, unconscious of the conditions that prevail elsewhere, or of the superior advantages of living in the District of Columbia, we know very little about the matter, and it seems to me we ought to have something more substantial before we enter into an investigation the cost of which we know not. I observe that the substitute which has been offered provides a new subject of investigation, that of assessment and taxation. While the chairman of the Committee on Rules was on his feet I made inquiry as to this, and found that it was to be added to the original inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Is not the gentleman from Pennsylvania fully aware of the fact that when this committee was organized a subcommittee upon taxation and assessment was created in the Committee on the District of Columbia for the first time in its history?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I believe that to be true. I know the subcommittee was created, and I believe it to have been the first time in the history of the committee that it was created.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman thinks the resolution has been broadened in the substitute by including a new subject matter. Now, that was not the view of the committee, I think I may say. It was the intention of the resolution, as the committee understood it, to include that subject, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] very properly suggested awhile ago that it was, in all probability, included under the language of the original resolution, but the committee thought perhaps it was desirable to make it more specific.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to say this: I do not want to be understood as opposing this resolution, because if there is anything that should be inquired into or investigated, I am prepared to join with the majority in making that inquiry and investigation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am drawing the attention of the House to the fact that it is entering upon no mean investigation. This investigation may or may not be completed within the limit of the expenditure of $2,500 to $5,000. First of all, we propose to investigate "the operation of the government of the District of Columbia." That is a very broad commission. There are States that are making investigations like that and bringing them up to their legislatures, and some of them are getting through with such investigations and some laying them over for another year. Then you are proposing to investigate the management and conduct of all the public-utility corporations of the District. That involves water, gas, and light, street and steam railways, and it involves all of the questions that all of the States to-day are wrestling with, at very great expense and at very great labor.

Now, you are imposing that task upon this committee which is to do this work at so moderate an expense. In addition to this, you are imposing on this committee the duty of investigating the capital and bonded indebtedness of the District of Columbia. That is a question that has invited the attention of all our cities and States and taken much time and care. And in addition to this, more basically important than all, you are proposing to impose upon this committee the serious problem of assessment and taxation. Now, I believe that this is the only question that I have heard entered as a complaint against the management of the District of Columbia, and, of course, it is not chargeable against the management of the District of Columbia. It is a matter of law. How many cities of this country have given years of investigation to questions affecting assessment and taxation, and in what city has it been satisfactorily settled? There have been commissions appointed by States that have gone into this question and have spent years in the inquiry. Paid commissions have undertaken the work, perhaps prolonged it because paid; perhaps they have worked sincerely, but the result of it has been the expenditure of time and labor and money that had to be paid by the municipalities or by the States.

Whatever we do here in the District of Columbia should be done so thoroughly and so well, not only with reference to the matter of the management of the District, but also with reference to the timely question of the management of public utilities and the very important and serious question of assessment and taxation, as to be a model for all the Nation. Now, then, if we are to provide an object lesson for New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston, or Linden, Tenn., or other cities, municipalities, and boroughs that are interested in these problems, perhaps we had better undertake the work in a broader and more comprehensive way than is here proposed. Can this committee cover the ground and bring in a satisfactory report with the means at hand? I am treating this matter seriously, because you are imposing a duty upon the District of Columbia Committee, or a subcommittee to be appointed by the chairman, that is so important and far-reaching that it is a grave question whether in the time allotted and with the means provided you can obtain the desired results.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield me a few minutes?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. How many? I have only five minutes, but I will yield the gentleman three.

Mr. MANN. We will give you more time if necessary.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. All right; I have no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, this authorizes the appointment of various subcommittees or only one subcommittee to carry on investigations at the same time? How many subcommittees can be created under this resolution? Can each of the subcommittees of the District of Columbia now start out on an independent investigation at Government expense, doing what they please, under this resolution?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does the gentleman desire me to answer?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will, in the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I believe a fair construction of it would permit the committee to organize several subcommittees

Mr. MANN. That is the way it seemed to me. Now, I have no objection to the passage of this resolution, but I would like to suggest to gentlemen on that side of the House, if they keep on with resolutions like this they will soon involve themselves into considerable difficulty. Here is a proposition now to give to a committee considering a purely legislative proposition power to send for witnesses at the Government's expense wherever they may please and bring them here to be paid out of the Treasury. I presided for a while over a committee of this House of considerable importance, dealing with great public questions, where it would have been extremely convenient to send to California for some man to come before us and give us his opinion upon something, and yet we never asked that power from the House. None of the other legislative committees have asked that power from the House. As this resolution was originally prepared it did not ask, in meaning probably, that power from the House. The investigation of accounts, the investigation of the expenditure of money is one thing, but the investigation of the subject of assessment and taxation is purely a legislative proposition. It is controlled by an act of Congress. The District Commissioners have nothing whatever to do with it except to enforce the law.

They have very little to do with the enforcement of the law. In that respect, under the law in the case of any proposition that comes up, a legislative proposition that comes before any committee of the House, is it the purpose of the Committee on Rules to give to that committee authority to invite confidential information, expert information, expert witnesses, expense without control? In this case it was not a committee of the House that asked for it. It was the Committee on Rules that proposed it—proposed to give to a committee on a legislative proposition authority to travel, authority to subpœna witnesses, authority to go on junketing trips, authority to do anything they please, and have the expense paid out of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] may be extended 10 minutes——

Mr. GARNER. In order that the gentleman from Tennessee may ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. GARRETT. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Texas may be extended 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks that the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] be extended 10 minutes. The gentleman from Texas has already controlled an hour. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. The last statement of the gentleman, with all deference, is hardly accurate. The Committee on Rules is not giving to this committee the power of expenditure. The Committee on Rules expressly refrained from going into the question of expense.

Mr. MANN. This gives to the committee the authorization of expenditures—the power to contract obligations. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. GARRETT. The argument of the gentleman is—and I agree in the main with the statement—that in order to investigate an assessment it is not necessary to have a resolution from the Committee on Rules, because it is a legislative power which the Committee on the District of Columbia already possesses, having jurisdiction, so that I do not think it adds anything in that respect, or adds but little, if anything; and certainly this does not carry expense. That is, for the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says this does not carry expense. This does carry expense. That is the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It seems to me that the additional power, in the way it is put in connection with other clauses of the resolution, authorizing the committee to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, documents, and so forth, is a power which, I think, they would not have unless this resolution is passed.

Mr. MANN. Very likely. I hope the gentleman will understand that I am not finding fault with this resolution or endeavoring to criticize this resolution, but just to suggest to gentlemen that when these resolutions are introduced, as they will be many times before this Congress expires—resolutions designed sometimes to do very effective work and sometimes to give very pleasant trips—they will have to be careful, because they do not advertise the trips on the face of the resolutions. Of course, I do not think this resolution, under the leadership of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will be wrongfully used.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman and other Members of the House to this proposition, that if with my vote or my consent this committee ever goes out of the District of Columbia, for any purpose, I will resign my seat in Congress.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not make that statement. The committee may have to go out, and I do not want the gentleman to have to resign his seat in Congress. I was talking about the form of the resolution.

Mr. GARNER. The last statement made by the gentleman——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. To the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARNER. The statement of the gentleman, made before he got an extension of time, was that this was an unlimited expenditure. As I understand it, it does not authorize the Committee on the District of Columbia or a special committee to spend a single dollar until the expenditure has been authorized by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken on that. It authorizes the committee to subpœna witnesses. The rules and the law provide that the witnesses shall be paid. Is not that giving the committee authority to incur expenses?

Mr. GARRETT. Did not the gentleman from Illinois suggest a few moments ago that any committee had the right already to subpœna witnesses?

Mr. MANN. Yes; and I guess I was mistaken when I did. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Now, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit, if I understood the gentleman from Texas, as well as the gentleman from Kentucky, that this resolution did not give any additional authority of expenditure except what is already contained in the rules and the law——

Mr. MANN. Oh!

Mr. GARNER. One moment further—and that that must come from the Committee on Accounts in order to get that authority, I wish to ask, suppose that the Committee on Accounts should say to the District of Columbia Committee, "We will limit your expenditure to $5,000," would that committee be authorized to expend more money than that?

Mr. MANN. Let me put a case to the gentleman now. I think the gentleman misunderstood his colleague from Texas. This substitute resolution does not provide for the payment of expenditures upon the approval of the chairman of the committee; that part is stricken out. But suppose the committee subpœnas a hundred witnesses from San Francisco, as it has the authority to do under this resolution, and the Committee on Accounts declines to pay the bill, could they recover it in the Court of Claims?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No.

Mr. GARNER. I am not going to pass upon that question of law just at this time, because I freely admit I do not know. But——

Mr. MANN. Suppose this committee finds it necessary to go to San Francisco. Who is going to pay the expense? They can not go to the Committee on Accounts until after the expenses are incurred.

Mr. GARNER. What I am particularly anxious about is to have the same rule applied to this committee that is applied to every other committee so far authorized to make special investigations; and if I understand my colleague from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the Rules Committee specifically struck out of this resolution any reference to expenditures or authorization of expenditures at all until the Committee on Accounts should authorize them.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas and to the other gentlemen that the resolutions which have been brought in by the Committee on Accounts in reference to the special committee on the steel investigation and the sugar investigation cover the subject in an admirable way. I hope the Committee on Accounts, if it has occasion to do so, will bring in some sort of a resolution on the subject.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is exactly what is contemplated by the committee.

Mr. GARNER. That is what I understood my colleague to mean, that he expected the committee to bring in some such resolution.

Mr. MANN. What I was calling attention to was the giving the committee authority to include legislative matters.

Mr. POU. The Committee on Rules refrained from putting any such provision into the resolution, because it would clearly have been subject to a point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I believe all gentlemen who desire to speak have done so, and I will ask for a vote on the resolution.

Mr. MANN. I supposed the gentleman was going to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will do that, not waiving the point that this is a privileged report and resolution. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered.

Mr. MANN. Why not dispose of the point, and ascertain whether it is privileged, and then ask unanimous consent?

Mr. GARRETT. Let it come up some other day, on a matter of greater importance.

Mr. MANN. The only reason I made the point was in order that gentlemen who offer resolutions of this character may understand that the Committee on Rules does not undertake to provide how the money shall be expended.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman and I agree exactly, and under no circumstances, as far as I am concerned, will the Committee on Rules undertake to deal with appropriations.

Mr. GARRETT. As the gentleman will remember, that is an entirely new practice, and the application of an entirely new principle.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. The Committee on Rules has reported in, I believe, several such propositions.

Mr. GARRETT. So far as I can recall in the past Congresses since I have been here there has not been a resolution for investigation reported from the Committee on Rules that did not carry the item of expenditures, and Hinds' Precedents states that while it is subject to a point of order, yet the practice has been for a long time to bring it in in connection with this resolution.

Mr. MANN. I looked up the matter thoroughly some time ago, and the practice is both ways.

Mr. GARNER. I understand that the Committee on Accounts has proceeded entirely in accordance with the views of the gentleman from Illinois as to what the practice should be.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think the gentleman from Illinois and I understand each other, and we agree that in dealing with the expenditures such language should be stricken out, because if left it would destroy the privileged character of the resolution, but would not destroy the power of the Committee on Rules to report in lieu thereof a privileged resolution to this House. That is a question I do not care to discuss now if we can avoid it because it might be debatable.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman had reported such a resolution, I should not have made the point of order. The gentleman reported an original resolution, which is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. But we reported a substitute, and did not report the original.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman reported an original resolution with a substitute by way of an amendment.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from Illinois well knows that we did that in order to give the House complete information about this resolution.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing the gentleman, but it is subject to a point of order. Why does not the gentleman ask unanimous consent for its consideration?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I am asking unanimous consent that the resolution and the substitute for the original be considered.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that it be considered.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That the substitute be considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MANN. We are now discussing a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No point of order has been made. A point of order has been reserved.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that the substitute as reported by the committee be considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the substitute may be considered.

Mr. MANN. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, what becomes of the resolution reported back to the House?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will ask unanimous consent that that be laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. It can not be laid on the table until the substitute has been disposed of.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We can by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That the substitute be considered by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the substitute reported by the Committee on Rules for the original resolution be considered and disposed of by the House without considering the original resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I suggest to the gentleman that the proper method is to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution and the report.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not object to that. I have been endeavoring to avoid discussion of this point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to suggest that this is an original resolution, with an amendment to it in the nature of a substitute reported by the Committee on Rules?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And I ask that the substitute and the report be considered by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the substitute reported by the Committee on Rules for the original resolution, together with the report, be considered by the House. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I see no way to consider the substitute without having before the House the original resolution, because the substitute is an amendment to the original resolution. I again suggest to the gentleman that his request be for the present consideration of the resolution and the report. That waives the point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, I will put it that way, Mr. Speaker, although I am willing to discuss the point of order, and I think I can sustain my position.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas modifies his request and asks unanimous consent that the resolution and report be considered by the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is now on agreeing to the substitute and report.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, before that question is put, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute be amended by striking out the word "House" in the first line, being a typographical error.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the substitute be amended by striking out the word "House" in the first line. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended by the substitute.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENRY of Texas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read. (H. Res. 195.)

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be, and it is hereby, authorized to have such printing and binding done for the use of the committee as is necessary for the conduct of its business during the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to call the attention of the Chair and of the gentleman from Kentucky to what I think is the fact, that the Speaker of the House stated a few days ago that he would not give recognition for unanimous consent on these resolutions any more; that they would have to go to the Committee on Printing. I think that was the statement made by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the present occupant of the chair is not aware of any agreement by the Speaker to recognize anyone, except that the Speaker stated to him that there were several resolutions to be offered, and he stated the name of only one gentleman who was to be recognized. I presumed that the gentleman from Kentucky had secured the right to recognition.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object, although I call attention to that fact. The Chair can not now help himself, having given recognition.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I was not aware of any such statement coming from the Speaker, and that I have understood that these several investigating committees that are having hearings have been allowed to have their hearings printed and such binding as is necessary done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Kentucky will indulge the Chair, the Chair did not say that the Speaker of the House when he left did not include the gentleman from Kentucky among those to be recognized. He said there were several resolutions, without designating by whom they would be offered, except in one case. The Chair did not mean to say that the Speaker had said the gentleman from Kentucky was not to be recognized. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I thought the gentleman from Kentucky possibly did not remember that several of these resolutions had been introduced and referred to the Committee on Printing and reported back from the Committee on Printing, which is the proper way, although I shall not object to this resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. McCOY, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. LLOYD, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MOON of Tennessee for one or two weeks.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Wednesday, June 7, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to House resolution 152, information in regard to contracts for Army shoes for the fiscal years 1901 to 1911, inclusive (H. Doc. No. 65); to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over at the request of the Senator from Idaho.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution, coming over from a former day.

The Secretary read Senate resolution No. 60, submitted yesterday by Mr. DILLINGHAM, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of the following members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, Senators DILLINGHAM, GAMBLE, JONES, KENYON, JOHNSTON, FLETCHER, KERN, and LEA, be, and are hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed forthwith to investigate whether in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices, and whether he is now entitled to retain his seat.

That said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress; to hold sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation; to employ stenographers, counsel, accountants, and such other assistants as it may deem necessary; to send for persons, books, records, and papers; to administer oaths; and as early as practicable to report to the Senate the results of its investigation, including all testimony taken by it; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

The committee is further and specially instructed to inquire fully into and report upon the sources and use of the alleged "jack-pot" fund, or any other fund, in its relation to and effect, if any, upon the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In lines 8 and 9 of the resolution, on page 1, I move to strike out the words "and whether he is now entitled to retain his seat." Those words do not appear in the Martin resolution which was sent to the committee, but were added to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont modifies his resolution as indicated. The modification will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In lines 8 and 9, on page 1, strike out the words "and whether he is now entitled to retain his seat."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. REED. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri does not object to its present consideration?

Mr. REED. He does not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is open to amendment, and the Senator from Missouri offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am not at all certain but that the resolution in its present form is all right, but in view of the fact that it has been held a subordinate committee of a committee does not possess the authority of a full committee of the Senate, and taking into consideration the fact that the resolution as originally passed by the Senate specifically stated that the committee should sit in banc, it seems to me we ought to make it very clear that the committee now being created is a committee of the Senate, directly appointed by the Senate, and owing its authority solely to the Senate.

I therefore suggest an amendment. I move to amend the first line by adding, after the article "a," the word "special," and after the word "committee," in the same line, the words "of the United States Senate," so that the sentence as amended will read:

That a special committee of the United States Senate, consisting of, etc.

I think that would be a little safer and a little more certain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 1, before the word "committee," insert the word "special," and after the word "committee" insert the words "of the United States," so that if amended it will read:

Resolved, That a special committee of the United States Senate, consisting of the following members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, etc.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, the words were not employed in reporting the resolution because it was not thought to be necessary, as this was declared to be a committee and was also directed to report directly to the Senate. I have no objection to having the amendment adopted if there is any possible doubt as to its being a committee of the Senate which would be authorized to act under the terms of the resolution. So I make no objection whatever to the amendment.

In this connection, however, I wish to state that when the Committee on Privileges and Elections took this matter up they spent considerable time in its consideration, both on Saturday and on Monday. The resolution was authorized in its present form for the reason that on that committee there are several members of other committees who are engaged in other inquiries requiring considerable time and they wished to be relieved of any work connected with this investigation. That recommendation was made by a vote of the committee and the chairman was directed to offer this resolution and to incorporate in it a clause requiring the report to be made, not back to the committee, but to the Senate.

I make this explanation because I thought the resolution was entirely clear, but since a question has been raised, I am very glad to have the amendment adopted.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, yesterday when this resolution was read in manuscript from the desk I objected to its consideration then because there were some changes in the resolution as reported from that as adopted by the Senate in what was known as the Martin resolution. I was particularly struck at the time and subsequently with the words on page 1, lines 8 and 9, "and whether he is now entitled to retain his seat," it occurring to me then and believing now that it at least squinted at the suggestion that this subject had been adjudicated finally by the Senate on the previous vote. But inasmuch as the chairman of the committee has on motion eliminated what I regarded as the principal objection to the resolution, though I believe it ought to have been reported in the words of the Martin resolution, I do not further object.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not understand that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has been adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not yet been adopted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think, Mr. President, it is safer to leave the resolution as it reads: "That a committee consisting of the following members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections" be appointed.

If the word "special" is used to distinguish the committee from a standing committee of the Senate, of course it is not necessary, because it is a special committee in that sense. If the word "special" is used to distinguish it from a committee with general powers, then I think it might be unwise to insert that qualifying word.

We want this committee to have all the powers of any committee of the Senate, and if we let the resolution stand as it was reported I think there can not be the slightest doubt that it will have all those powers. I think it is far better to leave it as it is than to put in qualifying words which might result in its being held that the committee has less power than it should have.

With reference to the other words, making it read "committee of the United States Senate," of course they are wholly unnecessary, because the committee is a committee of the United States Senate. It could not be anything else, being created by the Senate, composed of Members of the Senate, and required to report to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for a roll call.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 1, before the word "committee," insert the word "special," and after the word "committee" insert the words "of the United States Senate," so that if amended it will read:

Resolved, That a special committee of the United States Senate, consisting of the following members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, etc.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I can not possibly conceive any good purpose to be served by designating this committee as a special committee. It will not enlarge the powers of the committee, it will not change the personnel of the committee, and, consequently, I am unable to understand why it should be urged.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I want to say that the action of the full Committee on Privileges and Elections was taken on my own motion, because I am not able, and other members of the committee are not able, on account of our duties as members of the Finance Committee, to suitably execute the instructions of the Senate. Obviously it was impossible for me to aid in conducting this investigation without neglecting the duty which the Senate has assigned to me as a member of the Finance Committee, and when I urged that upon the committee some of them reluctantly consented to this action.

The members of the committee as reported are the members whom I proposed. Ordinarily, as the Democrat of longest service on the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I would have accepted service on this subcommittee, but for the reasons which I have already indicated I asked to be excused. The Democrat next to me in service on that committee is the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], but for reasons of his own, reasons which were deemed entirely sufficient, he also asked to be excused; and the Democratic membership of it was made up without any discrimination amongst us, the four Democrats assigned to the service constituting the remaining Democratic membership of that committee.

We felt, however, that as the Senate had already determined in favor of this investigation being made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, it was fair and right that this smaller committee should be made up from the membership of that full committee. It was necessary, however, in the view of some, and it was necessary, in my own view, in order to clothe that committee with all the power which the Senate could confer upon a committee, and to authorize it to invoke the Federal statutes against contumacious witnesses, that we should report it back to the Senate, and have the Senate constitute it as its committee. I did not think it ought to be called a subcommittee; I did not think it ought to be called a special committee; but I thought it ought to be called, as the statute calls it, "a committee"; and unless there is some reason affecting the powers or capacities of the committee, I hope the Senate will not undertake to change the name as reported by the full committee.

I did not myself participate in drawing the resolution which the honorable chairman of that committee [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has reported to the Senate, but I do understand that it was reported after a conference with the four Democrats who are to be members of that committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator from Texas if this committee would have any different power whether it is called "a special committee" or "a committee of the Senate," as it is called?

Mr. BAILEY. I think not. I can not imagine that to describe it as "special" or "sub" could enlarge or could curtail its power, and for that reason I should myself prefer to see it made a committee of the Senate, because that is the language of the statute.

Mr. BORAH. It occurred to me, Mr. President, that a special committee could not have any greater power in any event than a committee of the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. That is absolutely certain, and I am willing to grant that it could not have less power; but the statute does not speak of subcommittees; it does not speak of special committees; but it speaks of committees. I think we avoid all sort of question by conforming the language of the resolution to the language of the statute, and I hope that will be done.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I rise merely to say that the reason given by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] against the use of the word "special" seemed to me to be conclusive. I think we add nothing by its use. I should be quite willling to see the words "of the Senate of the United States" included after the word "committee." I do not think it is necessary, but I think it would be perfectly safe. So I rise for the purpose of asking for a division of this proposed amendment or suggesting that perhaps the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] might, while clinging to the second amendment, abandon the first.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say that in using the word "special" I had nothing in mind except to distinguish clearly between the proposed committee and the standing committee as such, so as to make it plain that this was not a subcommittee of the standing committee. My reason for this grows out of the fact that we all understand the courts, when they come to construe any act of Congress or of any legislative body, are constantly taking into consideration the history of the act itself and even have resort to the debates. If they were to take into consideration the history of this act up to this hour it would be this: The Senate passed a resolution specifically directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections in banc to take up and consider this matter. The committee reports back this resolution, and in the resolution uses this language:

That a committee consisting of the following members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

If they had not used that language, "members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections," no amendment would have been necessary, but having used it, I felt that some court might find a ground or a reason for saying, after all, this is only a subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that we had no right to allow any doubt to exist in regard to the matter.

Now, since the words "special committee" are objected to, I have no reluctance in withdrawing the word "special" and allowing the other words "of the United States Senate," which are agreeable to the Senator from New York, to remain, so that by specific language we may make the proposed committee a committee of this body and not a subcommittee of a committee.

I want to say that I did not offer the amendment with the intention of provoking any discussion or debate, and I will withdraw the word "special," allowing the rest of the amendment to stand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the word indicated by the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none. The question, then, is on agreeing to the amendment as it now stands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether, in carrying out his purpose to avoid the appearance of a subcommittee, we should not strike out the words "members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections"? Otherwise, upon the face of the resolution itself, this so-called committee of the Senate will appear to be merely a fraction of another committee.

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator that I think if we put in the words "of the United States Senate," so that it will read "a committee of the United States Senate," that will cover the question.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I would suggest, in agreement with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], that the words "the following members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections" are words of mere description. Of course, we could constitute no committee except a committee of the United States Senate. I believe if those words were eliminated and the resolution should read "that a committee consisting of the Senators named be appointed," that that would be quite as clear, and I think the phraseology would be a little less awkward.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas, in view of the fact that the resolution itself specifically defines the powers of the committee, whether the name of the committee has any significance whatever?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from California alludes to the resolution now before us?

Mr. WORKS. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I think not. I think those words are mere words of description and entirely—I will not say superfluous, because that might reflect upon the draftsman's skill or the honorable Senator who presented it; but I will say that they are unnecessary, and for that reason I think the resolution would read a little smoother if they were out. But that is immaterial with me. The only thing that I want made certain is that there is no question as to the power of this committee, because it is quite possible that they will reach a point in their deliberations where they will procure the evidence they seek if their power to obtain it is clear, where if their power is doubtful they might encounter a resistance. Consequently I think it ought to be made clear.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I should be sorry to see those words go out, and I suggest to the Senator from Texas that while they are not necessary to the efficiency and effectiveness of the resolution they do carry a certain significance as indicating that this resolution is not a reversal of the former action of the Senate or a repudiation of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but is rather a development in the natural course following upon the action already taken. I think they have a certain explanatory value for all who may consult the records hereafter regarding the course of this proceeding, and I should hope the words would remain.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, of course the Senator from New York and no other Senator would suspect the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of making a report that in any wise repudiated that committee, and I think that there will be no difficulty for any man interested in the matter to ascertain that these Senators are of that committee. I say to the Senator from New York that the real purpose which I had when I first took the floor was to incorporate in the record a statement of this transaction. It was more for that than for any other purpose that I rose.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think there is a good deal of force in the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I am of opinion that one of two things ought to be done, either the words "of the United States Senate" ought to be inserted, or else the words suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] ought to be eliminated. Either one course or the other will fix the difficulty, or possible difficulty, suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I understood that the words "of the United States Senate" were incorporated on the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BAILEY. That has not yet been done.

Mr. BACON. It is pending. I did not think that it had been agreed to. I do not think the Senate has acted upon it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I understand that it is contained in the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. That is my motion.

Mr. BACON. I certainly was very unfortunate if I did not so state. It is upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri and not upon mine.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I beg the Senator's pardon. I misunderstood him.

Mr. BACON. But I simply rose to say that I think one or the other course ought to be adopted. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Texas that the better course is the elimination of the words indicated by him, but it would be a mistake, I think, to fail to do either one or the other, because of the possibility of a construction by some court, which we do not wish to leave any opportunity for. Therefore I hope that one amendment or the other will be adopted. I would be content with the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, and if that shall fail I hope the other may be adopted.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "committee," in line 1, it is proposed to insert the words "of the United States Senate."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask that the order for the roll call may be vacated. There can be no reasonable objection to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to vacating the order for the yeas and nays? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ALFRED L. DUTTON.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 897) for the relief of Alfred L. Dutton. It will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Alfred L. Dutton shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Battery E, Third United States Artillery, on the 18th day of June, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES SERVICE.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Yesterday the Vice President laid before the Senate "a communication from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting a draft of a proposed joint resolution to provide funds for the continuance of the contagious diseases service during the remainder of the current fiscal year."

The Washington Star last night, under the headline, "Senator HEYBURN blocks effort to bring matter before the Senate," publishes an article which in part says:

Senator HEYBURN this afternoon prevented the laying before the Senate of an appeal of the District Commissioners for legislation providing funds for the continuance of the contagious diseases service.

Vice President SHERMAN, to whom the letter from the District Building was addressed, presented it to the Senate, but as the clerk was reading a summary of the commissioners' request Senator HEYBURN interrupted.

"Is that proposing legislation?" exclaimed Mr. HEYBURN. "If it does, it ought to come to some Member of this body."

The RECORD shows that I said it had better come from some Member of this body.

"That seems to be the nature of it," responded the Vice President, noticing a draft of a resolution inclosed in the letter, "and the Chair withdraws the communication."

The same statement, in substance, is found in this morning's Washington Post.

I desire it to appear, as the fact is, that I did not oppose the legislation except for the reason that it was not introduced or proposed by any Member of this body. It was purely because it was proposed legislation coming from some one outside of this body. I intended no opposition whatever to be made to the legislation, but only to the manner in which it came before the Senate, and I was not in any manner attempting to block the legislation. I am thoroughly in favor of it, and this morning it came in the usual manner, being presented by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I am in thorough accord with the legislation, and do not desire to be held up through the newspapers as having in any way opposed it or sought to delay it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the matter was clearly in violation of the resolution passed by the Senate January 20, 1908, and as soon as the Senator from Idaho called the fact to the attention of the Chair he withdrew the document and returned it to the Commissioners of the District, calling their attention to the resolution which the Senate passed in January, 1908.

OREGON & CALIFORNIA RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will occupy the time of the Senate for only a moment, and it is for the protection of the public that I desire to interrupt the proceedings for a moment.

Some time ago, acting in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate, a suit was instituted for the cancellation of the land grant of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. in Oregon, involving something like 2,000,000 acres of land. That suit has been tried and has been determined in favor of the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, there are various parties speculating on the decision of the higher court and inducing innocent people to invest in what they term "preference rights" to this forfeited grant. In other words, speculators are holding out to the public in various cities of the West that for a certain consideration they will obtain for those who are willing to invest money a preference right to these forfeited lands.

There is absolutely no warrant or authority for this attempted speculation upon the guileless public, and I want to call the attention of the public to the fact that there is no warrant or authority vested in anybody to sell these preference rights to the land which has been forfeited to the United States, even if the decision of the circuit court of Oregon should be sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

In this connection I desire to call attention to an article published in the Portland (Oreg.) Journal of May 16, 1911, and, as far as I may be able to do so, I desire to warn the public against speculating in these lands which have been forfeited to the Government, because if the decision of the Federal court of Oregon is finally sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States the disposition of these lands must finally be vested in the Congress of the United States. So nobody under any law which is now upon the statute books of the country is authorized to sell or to attempt to sell any of these lands to anybody who may undertake to purchase them now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

LOCATORS PLACE HOMESTEADERS ON FOREST RESERVES—RECENT DECISION IN OREGON-CALIFORNIA LAND-GRANT SUIT GIVES UNSCRUPULOUS OPPORTUNITY FOR FRAUD, ALLEGED.

[Portland (Oreg.) Journal, May 16, 1911.]

Formal complaint has been made to United States Attorney John McCourt by the Forestry Department that following the recent decision of United States Judge Wolverton in the Oregon and California land-grant suit there has been a resumption of the location of unsuspecting persons on railroad land within forest reserves. Large fees are charged by locators, it is alleged, and a rank fraud is perpetrated on those who give up their money for supposed right to valuable timber land.

NO CHANCE FOR TITLE.

There is, say the United States officials, absolutely no chance of anyone profiting by squatting on the railroad land within the limits of the United States forest reserves, as even should the Government finally be successful in the suit, the land within the reserves would at once become a part of the reserve and a squatter would be without a right to the land or a possibility of obtaining any. The locators whom District Forester George H. Cecil complains of as being especially active have been at work around Estacada, on the Springwater division of the Oregon Water Power & Railway, and are working out of Portland. They plan, it is said, to get unsuspecting people, who are unacquainted with the status of the land-grant suit further than that it was decided in favor of the Government, to pay them large locating fees to be shown a valuable tract of timber land now owned by the railroad, but which the court holds the railroad is not entitled to.

LOCATORS GET LARGE FEES.

"Unscrupulous locators have been placing people on lands involved in this suit," says Mr. Cecil, "within the boundaries of the Oregon National Forest. Large fees are extracted from these persons, who, through ignorance of the true status of these lands, have been led to believe they are open to settlement or that preference rights may be secured by squatting on them."

Land particularly referred to by Mr. Cecil is the odd sections in township 4 south, ranges 5 and 6 east.

The Government is powerless to prevent these fraudulent locations, the only remedy the bunkoed ones have being the bringing of civil suits in the State courts. It is possible, also, that people who locate on railroad land other than timber and outside of a forest reserve might at some future time be given preference in filing by an act of Congress. Such possibility is remote, however, and scarcely to be counted. It is generally expected, should the Government win its case in the Supreme Court, that nontimber lands will be sold in the same manner that recent Indian reservation lands have been disposed of, by the fixing of a minimum price and the sale of the land to the highest bidder, with provisions for settlement strict enough to limit the purchases to bona fide settlers.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I shall be brief in the remarks I propose to submit to the Senate to-day. I hope that this is the last speech I shall make upon the subject of the election of United States Senators by the people until the proposition comes before the people. I have participated in this discussion for many years, and now for the first time I see upon the horizon the sign of promise.

Before submitting the remarks I intend to submit, I want to appeal to those Senators upon the other side of the Chamber who are in favor of the election of United States Senators by the people to change their minds, if possible, upon the question of the Bristow amendment, which is substantially the Sutherland amendment of last session.

I do not intend to discuss the legal aspects of the subject matter. I have done this so frequently that it has become tiresome, and I do not intend to advert to it. I want to look at it from a practical standpoint just for a moment before I submit the remarks I intend to. And let me say this, that by adhering to the Bristow amendment you are imperiling the passage of the general resolution.

I will admit, for the sake of argument, that with the Bristow amendment in it the joint resolution will pass. I intend to vote for it, but I am only one. I am against the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], but I am for the joint resolution, even if the amendment of the Senator from Kansas should carry. But that is not the position of a great many of my colleagues upon this side of the Chamber.

Admitting for the sake of argument that with that amendment in it the joint resolution can obtain a two-thirds vote in the Senate, let me say this to you, and I say it with all the earnestness and sincerity that I possess: With that amendment in the joint resolution you imperil and jeopardize the ratification of the joint resolution by three-fourths of the States, as required by the Constitution. You might as well look at this question from a practical standpoint. It is not what I may think; it is not what any Senator here may think; but it is necessary to carry 36 States in order to ratify the joint resolution for the election of United States Senators by the people; and, in my judgment, with the Bristow amendment in it, you take a chance with nearly every Southern Commonwealth in this Union. With the Bristow amendment out of it, I do not believe the question will be asked upon the hustings in any of the Northern or Middle or Western States whether there is such an amendment in it or whether it is out. The attention of the people will not be directed to it. But it will be directed to it in the South.

The State of Georgia, for instance, in my judgment, will not ratify the joint resolution with this amendment. I do not think the State of Mississippi will ratify the joint resolution with the Bristow amendment in it, and I can name one Southern State after another in doubt, and we are not in a position to lose any of them.

Before submitting the remarks I intend to, because I did not intend to say anything about what I am now saying, I make an earnest appeal to those Senators who were with us last session not to change their minds now and force this amendment into the body of the joint resolution, because we must look to the end and the termination of this great struggle. And I say to you that I believe that if you place that amendment in it you imperil the joint resolution in every Southern State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I did not intend to say this when I rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. RAYNER. I will submit to an interruption.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does not the Senator from Maryland recognize that if the Bristow amendment should not be adopted it would imperil the joint resolution in a great many of the Northern and Western States?

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me just follow that for a moment.

In the first place I want to direct the attention of the Senator from Maryland to the fact that there are a great many people in this country who are sincerely opposed to taking from Congress the supervisory power over the election of Senators which it now possesses under the Constitution. Those people, or a very large number of them, will be found opposing the adoption of this joint resolution if it passes as it is now presented to the Senate, and in addition to that——

Mr. RAYNER. I understand that question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In addition to that every man who is opposed to that portion of the joint resolution which proposes to give to the people the right to elect will use this other provision for the purpose of defeating it before the legislatures.

Mr. RAYNER. I like to agree with the Senator from Utah, because I know he is always sincere and earnest, but I do not believe that this event will ever take place. I do not believe the question will ever be asked outside of the Southern States on any hustings in the country whether or not we, in substance, preserve this power in the Constitution. I do not think the attention of the people will be directed to it. I do not think they care. In other words, I think, with the Bristow amendment out of it, all the States which would vote for it with it in will vote for it anyway. But I do say you will have a tremendous struggle in the Southern States if you put it in to carry perhaps any one of them.

Now, let me proceed to the general discussion.

Assuming now that the amendment goes in or assuming that the amendment does not go in, upon this measure the time for action has arrived. I am satisfied that no one in this body can now be swayed one way or the other by argument. The ingenuity of the human intellect has been exhausted in the discussions upon this subject. I challenge the genius of the Senate to advance a single proposition upon either side that possesses the inspiration of novelty. The field of tradition, of history, public policy, and of constitutional and statute law has been explored in order to discover resources for this protracted debate that has now been progressing for years upon this mighty problem. The people have listened patiently and submissively, and now they demand from their representatives in this body the privilege of voting. They demand with rightful claim and resistless numbers that the right to vote shall pass from us to them. They have no intention of violating the spirit of the Constitution, and I deny now, as I have denied time and time again, that this change affects the spirit of the instrument. It takes away the election of Senators from the people's servants and transfers it to their masters. It withdraws it from the agent and confers it upon the principal. The spirit of the Constitution remains inviolate and intact, because the Constitution was made by the States, and this amendment, if adopted, will be the work of sovereign States, acting under constitutional prerogative. Three-fourths of the States and not three-fourths of the people must ratify this act. The power to amend stands isolated and alone upon the pages of that imperishable document, the power that obviates the necessity of revolution, because the States, when they speak, speak under the grant and privilege of the Constitution. The States have practically spoken, though not in constitutional form, and the people in the States have spoken.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senator whether any State has indorsed a change in section 4 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. RAYNER. None that I know of.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. RAYNER. But this is the point I am making——

Mr. HEYBURN. Would the Senator be willing to state how many States in his judgment would support such a proposition if it stood alone?

Mr. RAYNER. I believe this. I believe that if the Bristow amendment is left out of the resolution the general proposition will carry in almost every State in the Union. That is my firm conviction. I hardly think we would lose a single Commonwealth in the Union if Senators on the other side would take the Bristow amendment away from the body of the resolution.

The people are speaking everywhere. They have in some sections of the country lost their faith in legislative assemblages. In over 100 years since the Constitution was framed, the panorama of public life has moved on and the scene upon the canvas now represents the people in control.

The people have demonstrated that they are capable of self-government, and that the standard of this great assemblage will not be lowered if we permit them to select its membership. The system is now practically in vogue in every State where primary elections finally decide the issue. If the people of these United States are not qualified to elect their Senators, then they are not qualified to exercise the franchises of freemen or enjoy the advantages of republican institutions. If this is the condition, it might be best for us to resolve ourselves into an oligarchy and appoint political managers to select our public representatives for us. Speaking for myself alone, I would not desire to remain here for a moment if I thought my presence was distasteful to the will of my constituency. Though elected both at a primary election and, of course, by the general assembly of my State, nevertheless if I was here against the protest of my constituency, I would become so embarrassed in the performance of my public duties that I would feel that I had usurped the place I occupy. Who do I represent here; my State in its sovereign capacity? Yes. But what is my State except the people who compose it. Are the people of the State one thing and the State another? Then who is the State? Do the political leaders of the State constitute the State? Is that which has been rightfully denominated the despotism of the Republic the prevailing sentiment of this body? Fellow Senators, are we imbued with fear of the people of our States? Do we believe that in our supreme power we measure so much above the standard of their intelligence that they can not, in their limited vision, grasp the heights upon which we repose, that our selection must continue to be vested in the legislatures, and that the legislatures in a number of instances are also incompetent to make the choice and they must relegate it to an autocracy whose purposes are at war with the institutions of the Republic? I shall not discuss the merits of the proposition. I have finished this task in my advocacy of it for a quarter of a century, from the day that it passed with unanimity in the House of Representatives. We will discuss the merits in our several States when the subject is presented to them, and presented to them it will be. We have delayed it; we have postponed it; we have impeded and obstructed it, I will admit with the best motives on the part of the Senators who are opposed to it; but the hour has arrived when the battle is on, and that battle must either be lost or won. There is no compromise in sight. Principles can not be compromised, and this is not a policy but a principle that is involved. Dilatory tactics and parliamentary devices can not baffle and overpower the movement.

Every political reform of this sort has started in the camp of the minority and then it has gradually increased its converts until it has been taken up upon the tide of public opinion, and as the tide sweeps on to its destination the débris and the wreckage of stranded hulks can not obstruct it in its course. I know that public opinion changes; that at times it veers and trims with the passing winds, but never when it is in pursuit of a great political truth like this. It clings to it until the achievement and every hindrance becomes only an incentive to renewed effort. I hate to touch the Constitution of the United States. Not because it is a perfect instrument; because we know that it is not. We know that it was the result of compromise, conciliation, and adjustment; but there it stands, the greatest political document ever delivered to the human race. The patriots who framed it, however, foresaw that the day would come when it might require modification in its nonessential features, and so far as its essential features are concerned, they were willing to trust the people that they would never change the integrity of republican institutions. This is a nonessential feature, take it as you will, so far as the Constitution is concerned. It does not touch its life. On the contrary, the change will prolong its life. I said during the last session that the greatest argument delivered against this measure was that of the Senator from Massachusetts who preceded the present junior Senator from that State, and I attempted to show that the reasons advanced had all passed into oblivion. And so they have.

Mr. President, there is one circumstance, however, in connection with this business that I do not like at all, if I may be allowed to digress for a moment. I read in a paper the other day a brief editorial written by an old college friend of mine, who has a certain degree of intelligence and sense, which reads as follows:

How does Senator RAYNER come to accept the leadership of ex-President Roosevelt upon the question of the election of United States Senators by the people? We believe firmly in the position that he has taken, but how does he reconcile the anomaly of his standing upon precisely the same platform that the ex-President does?

I do not like this, Mr. President. When I am on a platform I stay there. The ex-President, however, has a peculiar gift and talent of getting on and off of platforms that I do not possess. No other individual in the United States has the genius that he has in this connection. He can make a speech upon the platform of a railroad train, where the stations are only a mile apart, and recant at one station what he had said at the station he had just passed; he can recommend the selection of a progressive Senator in one State, and then with equal vehemence indorse an extreme conservative in another; he can stand upon two political platforms, each radically differing from the other, and then deny that he stood upon either of them; he can coquette with both political parties and then start a party of his own, whose doctrines and principles consist of an incoherent medley of unconstitutional impossibilities; he can stand upon a platform before an intelligent audience of 3,000 people and tell them how at the dead of night upon the borders of an African jungle, upon the banks of a river that never had any existence, when no one was with him, he encountered and slaughtered a mythological animal that God had never created, and receive the wildest plaudits for the miraculous performance of this impossible accomplishment. [Laughter.]

Senators must not consider for a moment that I am in any manner unfriendly to the ex-President. On the contrary, I am very fond of him, and, as this editor says, we both agree in every particular upon the identical subject that I am discussing here to-day. My objection is not so much to the principles that he advocates, because I believe in quite a number of them, but in the peculiarity that he possesses of changing front so quickly that it is utterly impossible for the human mind to keep track of him in his evolutions. In this connection, I recall in the famous railroad-rate debate that took place during his administration that he sent for me to inquire how I stood upon the supreme issue that was before us at a critical stage of that controversy.

When I gave him the information he said that he was pleased beyond expression that I had arrived at the same conclusion that he had reached. "Now, stand to your colors," he said. "Do you recall what Colin Campbell said to his Sutherland Highlanders at Balaklava?" I happened to remember the incident that, turning to his regiment, he said: "Men, there is no place to retreat from. You must die where you stand." "That is exactly it," said the President. "You have a wonderful memory, and, if necessary, we will die together." The next day, when the vote was taken, I stood to my colors and died where I stood. Just as I was about dying, however, I looked around for the President, who had promised to die with me, but he had neither died nor retreated. On the contrary, I never saw anyone more constructively alive. Under the gentle guidance of the junior Senator from Massachusetts he had slipped away during the night, while we were all slumbering, and there he stood, it is true, with the colors in his hand, but they were the colors of the opposition, and when I returned to life and met him a short time afterwards the only explanation I received for this maneuver, unparalleled in point of strategy upon the pages of political history, was his remark to me: "Well, you all died a glorious death. I was so sorry I could not be with you." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I am not greatly interested in ancient or medieval illustrations in support of or in opposition to the measure that is now before us. I received a communication yesterday from an ancient friend of mine, inclosing an article of 180 closely typewritten pages upon "The historical evolution of the Spartan constitution and the Athenian Areopagus," and asking me whether I would have it published, as it would illuminate the subject now under discussion and make us desist from leveling this attack upon the traditions of the Republic. I do not intend to read a line of this article, whether it illuminates me or not. I do not intend to have it published. The author said if I would do so he would reimburse me out of the proceeds. Mr. President, there will be no proceeds. I wrote him that I had read everything of consequence that had ever taken place from the time that Eve and the serpent met in the Garden of Eden, and that I never intended reading another line of what has occurred in the past.

What do I care in this discussion about the Grecian assemblies at the time of Lycurgus? What difference does it make to me whether Lycurgus believed in a senate of elders or not, or whether Solon left the supreme magistracy of the state in the hands of its nobles, or whether Augustus destroyed the independence while he restored the dignity of the Roman senate? We are not nobles. I have enough dignity. I would rather have a little less dignity and more independence. I know that about the time of Cæsar the independence of the Roman senate ought to have been destroyed. The Senate then consisted of about 1,000 members, most of whom were privately and publicly depraved and corrupt and reflected disgrace and dishonor upon their rank and station. I have wasted years over this, and what I am concerned about now is the future and not the past. I am taking more interest in Senator BORAH, who is advocating this measure, and Senator HEYBURN, who is opposing it, than I am in Solon or Lycurgus or Julius Cæsar. My face is toward the rising sun. I see the most significant changes taking place around me, and history does not help me.

We can not disguise the fact that a peaceful revolution is taking place in this country. We may be upon the side of the revolutionists or opposed to them; it matters not. The fact, however, admits of no denial; it stands out in bold relief, and political independence is the order of the day in both parties. The people are shaking off the manacles and fetters of political slavery, and link by link their chain is breaking. I am not here to deliver any dissertation upon the extent of this movement nor upon its merits, so far as its contemplated purposes are concerned. One thing is sure, and that is that the conflict is on and that the people, led by patriots, are in the field. I deny that this movement is deteriorating the standard of intelligence or morality of the public service. A prominent Senator proclaimed to the country a few years ago that "the Decalogue in politics was an iridescent dream." Any person who at this hour would announce that a moral code in politics was a dream would be branded as an outlaw and banished from the field of his political activity. Instead of an iridescent dream it is a radiant reality. A few years ago party servitude was a badge of honor, and if an unqualified candidate was nominated for public office it was considered the duty of every party man to rally to his support, and it was held to be disloyalty and treason to revolt against the nomination; but treason prospered, and when treason prospers it is no longer treason.

The measure now before us is merely a sign and symptom of the movement. It was put to its practical test a short time ago in the State of New Jersey. I am not just now selecting presidential candidates because I am not a politician, thank God. I do say this, however, that never upon the pages of our political history was there a more fearless exhibition of independence than that of the governor of that State upon this occasion. It was not a personal or political matter at all. A primary election had been held and I do not care how many or how few people voted at that primary, the people had the opportunity to vote and if they did not exercise the right it was their fault. Governor Wilson announced the principle that a moral obligation rested upon the legislature to sustain the result of the election. I am not disparaging anyone who was a candidate before the legislature. I am upholding, however, to the last degree, the principle that was proclaimed. He denied the right of anyone to corral the legislature and his undaunted courage in laying down the gage of battle to the forces that opposed him has drawn for him, from every section of the land, the commendation of his countrymen. It is the same way with us. We can not override the will of the American people, and we might as well fall in line with it. We might as well recognize the fact that this Senate is not more powerful than the constituencies it represents, and that we can not throttle this reform any longer. The senior Senator from Idaho, with all his daring intrepidity and all his defiant courage, backed by the resources of his powerful intellect, can not march single handed over this land and overpower 90,000,000 of his countrymen.

The Senator, to whose arguments I always listen with a great deal of interest for a number of reasons and for one reason principally, and that is because he uses as good and pure English diction and expression as any Senator upon this floor, says that the matter has never been properly explained to the people. Now, let the Senator explain it, and I venture to say that with every explanation he will make converts upon the other side of the question.

Mr. President, there is no constituency in this land so benighted that it does not understand it.

And let me tell you it is a great mistake to suppose that this amendment depends for its support upon the ignorant masses of the country. It is exactly the opposite; it will gather its strength from every community where political integrity rules and intelligence prevails. As the roll is called from Commonwealth to Commonwealth you will find that from our seats of learning, from the ranks of educated labor, from our colleges and academies and universities, its apostles come, with free ballots and with ballots that are not for sale, and they comprise the flower of the rising generation of this land, who are not agitators or demagogues, who understand the philosophy of our institutions, who have determined to break the bonds of political servitude, and who have arrived at the conclusion that for them the road to an honorable ambition lies not upon the narrow path of legislative influence, but upon the open field where freedom thrives and honor blooms.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it had not been my intention at this time to speak on the joint resolution or on the amendment, but the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] has made some statements to which it seems to me it is well to reply. He has, as I understand him, suggested that because of the slight attention that would be paid to the amendment of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution, the people might be led to adopt it in ignorance of the fact that it was a part of the subject matter for their consideration. That does not appeal to me. Any proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States should be impressed upon all of the people and the fullest knowledge should be had by all of the voters as to its purpose.

I asked the Senator from Maryland if any State had ever proposed or recommended the amendment of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution. He said he knew of none. Mr. President, no State has ever suggested to Congress or at all that section 4 of Article I should be amended. It can not be claimed on behalf of that amendment that there is any pressure or demand from any part of the people of the United States that that part of the Constitution should be changed. Is it now proposed to attract the attention of the people to the amendment of section 1, and then, if I may use the term, slip in surreptitiously—without knowledge or notice to the people—an amendment to another and different part of the Constitution that is separate and distinct in its purpose and effect?

How is it that up to this day no one outside of this body has ever proposed to amend section 4 of Article I, or that it has never been thought of in the legislative bodies of the country or among the people of the country that section 4 of Article I should be amended?

The Senator says that unless section 4 is amended the States will repudiate the amendment to section 1. Well, in my judgment, the States will repudiate the amendment to section 1 and to section 4, or to either of them if those amendments are submitted to the people for their consideration. What possible excuse can there be in this hour for attaching the amendment to section 4 to the amendment to section 1 except it be to gain a strength for the amendment to section 4 which it could not otherwise obtain? Is that the high plane upon which legislative matters should rest, that you are going to use one section or one proposed amendment as a club to compel the people to support that which they do not want in order that they may obtain something that they do want? Is that the proper spirit in legislation, whether it pertains to amendments to the Constitution or whether it arises in the ordinary course of legislation?

What State in this Union would support the amendment to section 4 if it stood alone? Does the Senator dream that it could receive the support of a sufficient number of States to adopt it? Why not, if Senators think that section 4 should be amended, submit it as a separate amendment to the Constitution? Why not introduce a joint resolution in this body proposing to amend that section, and let it stand upon its merits? No. But they would dragoon those who favor the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, as they call it, into their cause in order to gain strength for that which without it would have no strength whatever.

Will a Senator who is in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] submit to the introduction of a new element into this question in order that he may perhaps succeed in amending section 1? I doubt it. There is and there can be no reason why any Senator on this side of the House should support the proposition to amend section 4. If they are wedded to the idea of electing Senators by direct vote of the people, what else can they do but support the amendment introduced by the Senator from Kansas?

That is assuming, for the purpose of argument, that the proposition to amend section 1 has merit; it is assuming, for the purpose of argument, that the proposition to amend the Constitution so as to do away with the intervention of the legislatures is of sufficient importance to compel them to submit to an amendment to section 4 which has never been discussed by the people, never been advocated by any legislature, and which has no support based upon the demand of the people of the country.

No man has ever voted upon the question of the amendment of section 4; yet we are told on the other side that unless we submit to that amendment that has received no consideration outside of this body they will defeat the entire proposed amendment of the Constitution. Whenever the Congress of the United States resorts to that character of pressure for the purpose of enacting or on behalf of the enactment of a law or the change of the fundamental law, it will have abandoned principle and resorted to the law of expediency or resorted to the law which governs the highwayman—the alternative that is presented to a man, "if you do not abandon the principles that have marked your career and your course all your life we will defeat you in a just cause."

I am not one of those who believe in the amendment to either section 1 or section 4. A few days since I gave my reasons for my opposition to the proposed amendment, and I am not going to attempt to cover that ground again. I am speaking now against the adoption of a measure here that proposes to change the fundamental law of the land without any pressure or demand whatever on the part of the people. What does the proposed amendment do to section 4? It leaves it, as was admitted by some Senator on the occasion of my former discussion of this question, a skeleton, without the form or semblance of law as law is written. It eliminates from the section the provision relative to the election of Senators, and leaves the provision giving Congress the power to fix the time, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives stand alone in the section. What becomes of the principle for which they profess in this hour to contend? Why should one rule pertain as to the election of the Members of the House and be rejected as to Members of the Senate? The proposed constitutional amendment eliminates from section 4 the provision—

> But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

That is eliminated entirely and we have remaining the mere skeleton:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives shall be prescribed, etc.

Mr. President, there are some suggestions that I desire to make in addition to those I have heretofore made in regard to the election of Senators by what is called a direct vote. The population of our country is changing in character, and has been changing for half a century. The relation between the native-born American to-day and the foreign-born citizen of the United States is so radically changed from what it was 50 years ago that it enters into the consideration of this question. It was, 50 years ago, two-thirds American sentiment and one-third mixed sentiment. To-day the condition is reversed. It is one-third American sentiment and two-thirds mixed sentiment, from which we must gather the strength that will support the American sentiment. The proportion between those two classes of citizenship must be taken into consideration. We are receiving into this country an element of people that bring no traditions incident to our country with them. They come from other countries where the participation of the people in the determination of public questions does not exist. They come to this country with the idea that it is in the nature of a socialistic Government. They know nothing at all of the foundation, principles, or traditions of our Government. It takes generations for them to become imbued with the ideas essential to the maintenance of this Government; they seek to change it from the time they land on our shore. The element that supports the revolutionary party of this country is a foreign element. By and by, as gen-

Mr. BORAH. My colleague suggests there was a reason why the States were given control over the manner of electing electors, and why the States were given control, subject to the regulation of Congress, over the manner of electing Senators. I ask, as a matter of information, what was that reason? I have never been able to understand why the fathers gave to the legislature of the State the sole and exclusive power to prescribe the manner of electing electors and why they differentiated with reference to Senators. If there was a reason assigned in the debates or elsewhere I would be glad to have my colleague suggest it. I have never been able to find it.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is arguing that the presumption is against the wisdom of the founders of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is an humble and a frank admission on the part of the Senator from Idaho that he would like to learn something from his colleague.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do learn something every day from my colleagues, and the man who does not is probably either overegotistic or perhaps deficient in appreciation.

Mr. BORAH. I asked the question in perfect good faith. I assume my colleague thought I was simply bantering.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I did not. I know the bent of mind of my colleague well enough to know he is sincere in what he does. But he has asked me a question, and it is my intention briefly to reply to it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not want to be interrupted just now. I will yield to the Senator from Oregon later.

When the question of the organization of this Government, as represented by the Constitution of the United States came before the people there were already States in existence, sovereign States, each bound only by articles of confederation. There was no concrete existing government, and it was necessary, in order to induce those States to enter into the compact represented by the Constitution, to recognize the States as governments, each distinct. The question arose as to how, or whether or not they should be a part of a general council of the Nation; and through long, hot days of debate that question occupied the attention of the constitutional convention. First, the question whether there should be one or two bodies. The States under the Confederacy had only one legislative body. They had no body of legislators which represented the States as States. The only legislative body they had represented all of the people in a Congress.

The States were not willing to give up their individual sovereignty unless they could retain their identity as States; and it was a question of contract between them as to how this branch of the Government, in which the States should appear as States, should be represented, and, secondly, how that representation was to be brought about. The disparity in size of those States, or of some of them, entered largely into the determination of that question. The smaller States, like Delaware, New Jersey, and others, were not willing to enter into any other body than the House upon the basis of their population. They said: "We are sovereign States; we want representation in a body in which all the States will be equal, have the same vote in determining questions that affect the Union or affect the States separately." They demanded it as a condition precedent to entering into the contract of government.

There would have been no occasion for having two Houses of Congress except for that condition. The demand for two Houses of Congress was based upon that condition. Otherwise, can any Senator give any reason why there should be two Houses of Congress?

If you are going to change the method of making up the Senate to the same method that prevails as to the House, you have only two Houses of Representatives. That is all. There is no longer that representation of the State as an entity. They would all be elected by what is called a popular vote, subject to the evils I have pictured.

I have heard my colleague say—and I suppose he is saying it now in his own mind—that the election by popular vote does not change the fact that the popular vote of the State elects the Senator.

But the government of the State is embodied in its legislature by the constitution of every State in the Union. The only government that the State has is crystallized in its legislature, and that is something for the State to look to. That which is crystallized government is recognized as the entity of statehood.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The government of a State is crystallized in its executive, its judicial, and its legislative departments all combined. If you speak of it in the manner in which my colleague speaks of it, it would have been just as appropriate, if the fathers had seen fit to do so, to have referred the selection of Senators to the executive department. It could have been just as well said that the executive department alone, pursuing the argument which my colleague is pursuing, represented the government of the State. Now, as a matter of fact, speaking simply as a governmental entity, it is represented by the judiciary, the legislative, and the executive departments.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is true the State might have taken that position; but they did not. It was the States, and not the General Government, which determined how they should be represented in the United States Senate and how that representation should be procured. It was the States which opposed the idea that was advanced that Senators should be selected by the governor or by other portions of the State government. But it must be admitted that whatever government for the purpose of making laws there is in the State is in the legislature of the State. There is no government for legislation in the judiciary of the State, nor in the executive officers of the State; it is in the legislature. That is where the State government is crystallized, because the highest function of every government such as ours is in its legislative power. The courts are made by legislation, or the equivalent of it; they are added to or changed by legislation, or the equivalent of it, whether it be the State constitution or an act of its legislature. The States demanded this method of doing it, because the legislature was the only medium of power through which the State could act.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. If my colleague will pardon me for making one more suggestion——

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; it does not bother me at all.

Mr. BORAH. The legislature is the lawmaking body of the State, and it represents the sovereignty of the State so far as the lawmaking capacity of the State is concerned. One of the great objections which we have to permitting this function to remain with the legislature is because it is not a lawmaking function which the legislature is performing, and it is turning the legislature of the State into a political convention, which results in its being torn and distracted and venalized and corrupted by those things which work alone for political purposes and not for the purpose of making laws for the benefit of the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that is the old argument of incompetency or unfitness of the legislature to perform this duty. The sovereignty of a State is in its legislature and nowhere else. It is not divided between the legislature and other functionaries of government. The sovereignty of a State rests where the lawmaking power rests, and it is not elsewhere, either in the State or in the General Government.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Does my colleague contend that the sovereignty of a State is confined alone to the legislative department of the State?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, absolutely; and it was never written otherwise.

Mr. BORAH. Then when two governors are dealing with one another in reference to extradition neither of them represents the sovereignty of their respective States.

Mr. HEYBURN. They are merely the agencies of the legislatures that pass the law authorizing them to deal with each other.

That is police power. That is simply an act giving the performance of police duty by which one governor issues a requisition at the request of another for the purpose of apprehending those who have violated the law. The Senator would not contend that that was an act of sovereignty any more than he would contend that the arrest of a man on a street corner was an act of sovereignty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. There is something which authorizes that to be done. The States have other powers that are granted through the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution of the United States is the foundation upon which the right of extradition rests; it was a part of the contract that formed the Nation.

erations come, they drop out, but they are reenforced by others that are coming in. For the last half century we have had to contend against the foreign idea or conception of our Government; we have had to contend against those who, because of their unfamiliarity with our system of government, are wandering in the field of political conjecture without any anchorage.

These conditions emphasize the necessity of standing by our written Constitution, which represented at the foundation of our Government the true principles upon which the Government should rest and which represent them in a larger measure to-day than ever before. There is more necessity to-day than there ever was for a citizenship that adheres to the foundation principles of this country, because of its traditions, because of the reasons for their adoption.

The Senator from Maryland says we are in an era of peaceful revolution. If this element is to grow and extend its influence upon our Government, we may find ourselves in a revolution that is not a peaceful one.

The guaranty, and the only guaranty, we have for the maintenance and continuance of our institutions under the Constitution is to maintain them. Nothing should recommend a change in the organic law of this country that arises in times of peace. We have never unwritten a word of the Constitution since it was adopted. It has never been seriously proposed that we unwrite a provision of the Constitution until in this hour, and we are proposing to write out of it the power of Congress to maintain the Government, to defend it against attempts to undermine and sap the fundamental law. Never until this hour has it been proposed to diminish the power of the Government in maintaining its own life and integrity. Men have talked it, revolutionists have preached it, theorists have prated about it, but statesmen have never before proposed to unwrite any provision upon which the power and the supremacy of our country rested.

At no time has it been proposed, prior to this hour of political disturbance referred to by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], that we should take away from the States acting as States the power to perform their constitutional functions in selecting Members to this body. Never has it received the consideration or the serious consideration of the Senate of the United States, and yet we are told now that we are going to change the whole system that regulates the relations between the States and the Government under the specious pretext of getting nearer to the people.

How does it get nearer to the people? As I see it only as it is, in the parlance of the police records, that it will get nearer to the people in order that it may get its hands into the pockets of the people's rights and filch them away. That is the way it will get nearer to the people.

Look at the result! To-day we have under consideration a great investigation involving the regularity of the election of a Member of this body. We are called upon to investigate the proceedings of the legislature of a single State. We can not attack or question the right of any member of the legislative body to hold office. We accept the legislature as the people of the State constituted it. What do we propose to do now? We propose to make it necessary, in the event of a contest, to investigate every county and precinct and ward in any State where a controversy arises. We open the temptation to those who would gain by these contests to contest, through the committees of this body, the elections in wards and counties and precincts.

We endanger the stability of the act of the people in another way. Should Senators be elected at a general election where precinct, county, State, and other officers are elected, the result of those elections could be tied up indefinitely. Proceedings to determine the regularity of an election at which State and county officers are elected would involve the determination of the election of a United States Senator which depended upon the vote in those subdivisions of our Government.

If a great contest arose over the election of a Senator from one of our great States within which great cities exist, we would have to send our committees to the ward poll books, to the county returns or the returns of the State; and Congress can not take away from the courts of the States the right to investigate those elections. Congress can not controvert the conclusion of the courts as to whether or not the polls were opened at the hour provided by law; as to whether or not the ballots were counted in the manner provided by law; as to whether or not the returns were made in the manner provided by law. They would be subject to the control and decision of the courts in proceedings familiar to every Member of this body regarding the regularity and the legality of the election; and then what would become of the United States senatorship?

No man could appear at the bar of the Senate with credentials until those questions were determined in the local courts. Who then would be determining the right of a Member to his seat in this body? The local courts, the supreme courts of the States, after the long term or procedure in which the consideration of the legality of those elections were being heard and determined. No man could appear at the bar of the Senate, because he would have no authenticated credentials which would authorize him to appear here.

Now, that might occur in one State or it might occur in all of the States, and it would be a temptation to many who were making a desperate struggle to be elected to this body to throw confusion about the election, to have claims made as to its irregularity, in order that it might be tied up in the courts, and there eventually, perhaps one or two or three years afterwards, be determined.

You transfer, in effect, the right to determine the membership of this body from the body itself to the minor courts of the land. We could not take up for consideration a question whether or not any man had been elected a Member of this body until the returns were canvassed. There is not a Senator here who has not in his own mind fresh the recollection of cases in which the canvassing of the returns of the election was enjoined by a court or controlled by it. The very foundation upon which the Senate bases the consideration of the question as to the right of one claiming membership in this body could not even be initiated until the courts having jurisdiction under the laws of the State had passed upon it.

These objections suggest themselves to the minds of Senators when they talk about taking the power and the duty from the legislature and placing it in the ward precinct. These questions are of such vast importance that they overshadow all of this political cry of corruption in legislatures. Is corruption more likely to exist in a legislative body than it is in the voting precincts of a State?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Will the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. As a matter of fact, is not the spirit of the Constitution violated now in those States where primary elections are held for the nomination of Senators and where the legislature usually follows the direction of the voters of the States with reference to the election of Senators?

Mr. HEYBURN. If there is one thing in my political career that I am more proud of than another, it is that I have always and consistently opposed the system suggested by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the Senator the question if it is not a fact that in most of the States of the Union the spirit of the Constitution is now violated in that respect, in that the people nominate their Senators and the legislature follows the suggestion of the people with reference to the election?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am restrained by such patriotism as I have from confessing that the Constitution of the United States is indirectly violated.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Is it not so?

Mr. HEYBURN. It would be a crying shame against the people of the country to admit that the Constitution of the United States was being indirectly violated; and no man is a safe legislator or representative of the people who favors the indirect violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho further yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Whatever the Senator from Idaho may say with reference to that, I ask him if there is any provision in the Constitution which requires the elector, after he has been elected, to vote for any particular candidate for President?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a stock argument. I have heard it so often. It is a comparison that is not a comparison. It is begging the question. The Constitution provides one manner for the election of Members of the House of Representatives. It provides another method for the election of presidential electors. Is that any reason why we should change the Constitution in regard to the manner of electing United States Senators?

There was a reason for the adoption of the different methods in the beginning, and that reason is just as potent to-day as it was then.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. At one time in the Constitutional Convention Mr. Hamilton suggested that Senators be elected by dividing the States into districts and electing electors, which electors should choose a Senator. If that had been done, would not the Senator have represented the State the same as he does now?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is equivalent to asking whether or not if the Constitution of the United States had contained the Decalogue it would not be a religious institution. The fact is that they did not do it. The fact is that Mr. Hamilton's proposition was not accepted. The fact is that his methods of government were not adopted in that regard, and what is the use of wasting time in discussing the question as to what would have happened if Mr. Hamilton or Mr. Madison or any other member of that body had succeeded in forcing upon it views that were never accepted?

Mr. BORAH. I think there is a good deal in the suggestion of the Senator that we are wasting time in the discussion, but I am not willing to admit that Mr. Hamilton did not know where the sovereignty of the States rested.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, he did not know any better than my colleague knows or than I know or than other Senators know. If we are to be governed by the rejected wisdom of the patriots of that age, there would be no limit to what we might do in interpreting the fundamental law of the land. There is no use in wasting time over it. If something else had been done we might not have been a government; we might not have endured to this day. I can imagine several things that were proposed in the Constitutional Convention that made the Constitution of the United States which would have resulted in the disruption of this Government long ago.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator if he entertains the same fear that is entertained by many who have the same opinion he has—that if the amendment his colleague is pressing prevails the States will be deprived of their equal representation in the Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not equal representation now. I discussed that question the other day and I promised that I would not go over it again. It is an important question. It goes not to the question that we have under consideration to-day, but it would pertain to the question of the calling of a constitutional convention. Many of the States have requested that a constitutional convention be called. We do not need to discuss that in this hour, because we are not proposing that a constitutional convention shall be called.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I call the Senator's attention to Article V of the Constitution, which provides——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am very familiar with that article.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It provides—that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

It can not be done without the express consent of that particular State. So if all the other States were to consent to a change of their representation in the Senate, still Idaho might insist that it should be represented by two Senators.

Mr. HEYBURN. As I have stated, it is not worth while to enter upon a discussion of that question. The people of the United States are greater than the Constitution; they made it. They did not create anything that was greater than all the people. If the people of the United States meet in a constitutional convention to-day, they meet there with an unlimited right to make a constitution. You can not limit it. Congress can not limit the rights of the people, nor say what they shall do when they meet in a constitutional convention. They could disregard the article to which the Senator from Oregon refers and make a constitution in which that did not appear.

When the States are calling for a constitutional convention they know not what they are doing. They know not the danger that would confront them under such circumstances. It ought to be the wish and the hope of every patriotic American citizen that we would never again meet to make a constitution. With all the conflicting interests of this day and this age, with the great corporations, with the great labor question, with the hundred issues, you never could get 90,000,000 people to agree upon a constitution. No country the size of this country could make a constitution in this age. It is only in the incipient periods of government that they can do that kind of thing.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. When there is no government and when there is a necessity for the creation of a government, then the smaller number that are always represented under such conditions can agree. There is the element of necessity; there is the spur to do something that will enable the people to have laws and enforce them; but with 90,000,000 of people we could never agree upon a Constitution. There would be the sectional questions, the race questions, the great moral questions which are before the country; they would all have a strong representation in such an organization and insist that a particular tenet should be incorporated into the Constitution. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, if the Senator will just give me his attention for a moment; I was called out of the Hall during a part of his argument, but I wish to ask him a question. I do not suppose anyone on this floor is more familiar than the Senator from Idaho with the constitutional history of the country. I want to ask his view on this point: I adverted the other day to what was done when the States ratified the Constitution of the United States, and the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] made an exhaustive argument on the same subject at the last session. It was done by 9 of the 13 States. The records of the other 4 States are lost, but I never had any doubt in my mind, and I do not think the Senator will have any doubt in his, that they would have adopted similar provisions. Nine of the 13 States put in the articles of ratification a construction of this fourth article, which did not give Congress the power to make, change, or alter the regulations of the States.

Now, I want to ask the Senator whether in his opinion, in arriving at the intention of the lawmakers, the best evidence of that intention is not what is contained in the articles of ratification?

I will follow that with another question. I ask the Senator whether in his opinion the Constitution of the United States would ever have been ratified if any one of those nine States had put the construction upon that constitutional article which the Senator from Idaho now places upon it?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in the first place, the resolutions of ratification are no part of the Constitution of the United States. It has been held that they are no part of it, and they can not be appealed to in the construction of the Constitution in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like the Senator from Idaho to give me a single authority upon that subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. I might very easily be led off into a legal discussion and review of every decision of the Supreme Court in regard to this matter, but Senators must search for themselves. I take the responsibility of standing here in my place in this body and saying that the resolutions of ratification have never been held to be a part of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. RAYNER. That is certainly true. No one would contend that the articles of ratification are a part of the Constitution of the United States, because, if they were, they would be in the Constitution. But are not the articles of ratification the best evidence of what the States intended when they ratified the Constitution?

Mr. HEYBURN. They are not evidence at all.

Mr. RAYNER. One moment. When Virginia, North Carolina, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and all the States placed in their articles of ratification a provision that they would not ratify the Constitution if it meant what the Senator says it means—that Congress should make and alter the regulations—does the Senator say that is no evidence at all of the intention of the States?

Mr. HEYBURN. The intention of men in a State is one thing. I repeat that the resolution of ratification has never been held, and I assert it never will be held, to be a part of the Constitution or proper for consideration in the interpretation of any provision in the Constitution of the United States. The Senator will search in vain through the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States for a reference to them in aid of the interpretation of any provision in the Constitution of the United States. When that great charter was written, it excluded everything that had preceded it in the way of argument as to why it was written. Through all the consideration given to the Constitution by the great jurists who had to deal with it in the first 30 years of the life of our country there is no decision based upon the ratification or the terms of the ratification of the Constitution. The Constitution was complete in itself, sufficient to enable the courts to establish a rule that could not be tempered by the resolutions of ratification, and we must consider it in this day.

Are we to shake the foundation of the Constitution by an appeal to that which transpired in the constitutional convention or in the proceedings of the States when they were considering its ratification? In the hour when we enter upon that method the Constitution will lose its great character that has been the safeguard of this Government. Certainty in the law, certainty in its meaning and in its execution, is of first importance. Can you come in 100 years after the making of such an instrument and show by irresponsible action of men—and it was irresponsible—that they did not mean what they said when they ratified, not the resolutions—they did not ratify the resolutions—but ratified the Constitution which did not contain the resolutions?

Mr. President, the question is, Shall it be changed? What has arisen in this country that justifies, much less demands, its change? Of course, it could be changed in many ways, perhaps, without destroying its efficiency as a basis for government, but the question now is not could it be done, but should it be done. What will be the demand to-morrow do you think? What will be proposed as the next amendment to the Constitution of the United States?

I know men who will be clamoring for a change in the manner of electing the President of the United States. I know men who will be clamoring for the recall of the Representatives of the States from Congress. I will not believe that there is a Senator in this body who would support such a proposition, yet I have seen it in print recently that the Constitution should be changed so as to permit a recall of the Representatives of the States in both Houses of Congress. What next? To destroy the life tenure of the judges will be the next one. Those who do not know the Constitution, who have no intelligent conception of its purpose, would support such an amendment. To limit the tenure of office and inject ambition and politics into the United States Supreme Court and break down the stability of our Government is one of them. Just start this raid upon the Constitution once and see where it will end.

You will see men standing up and claiming that the people are clamoring for it. The only people who are clamoring for those things are those who have no proper conception of the purpose of the system of our Government. Just open this door once and you will see. It will not be opened, thank God. The States will reject your proposition, and there will be hours and years for discussion among the people. The people love the Constitution of the United States and the Government that it stands for, and their vengeance will fall upon those whom they discover in the act of trying to subvert it and change it to the passing whims and fancies of a period of time where men's ambition is clamoring for a change of conditions in order that they may gain something. The people will awaken to this fact.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood the Senator to say a few moments ago that under certain influences, which he described, the voters of the United States had become incompetent and unfit to elect Senators by direct vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. Either the Senator's ears or my tongue must be out of order—one or the other.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure it was the Senator's tongue, for I could not have misunderstood his very studied reference to the influences of immigration and the consequent deterioration of the citizen of the United States. Immigration has brought us men, as claimed by the Senator, without tradition, without sentiment for free institutions, without the understanding of free institutions. Did not the Senator a few moments ago make the argument I have just cited?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am unable to see the connection between that statement and the first. I presume the Senator can connect them.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator was proceeding to decry the amendment to the Constitution because, he asserted, legislatures would elect better men to the Senate of the United States than the voters he described would elect to the Senate of the United States. That was the conclusion of the Senator's argument. Am I not right?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will tell the Senator what I said, and I will apply it. The Senator seems to have been unable to apply my remarks to the question under consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. I often find myself unable to apply not only the remarks of the Senator from Idaho, but a great many other remarks I hear on the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. To take up distinct subjects and embody them into a continuous question presents a difficult problem sometimes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think this is a difficult problem for the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, let us see what I will do with the problem. I referred to the standard of the new citizenship in connection with the question of the conservative, reliable element of the American people that must be depended upon to maintain the traditions and the principles of our Government. I never will retreat from that statement. Our immigration is made up from men who are not familiar with American institutions. The great majority of them know nothing of the history out of which present conditions grew. The great majority of them know nothing of the traditions of the Government as crystallized and embodied in the laws that govern us, and too often their first effort is to change a law which is a surprise to them, or inconvenient, as it may be.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment. I do not apply that to all the citizenship that comes to us. I was simply issuing a warning against taking the judgment of that predominant element as against the judgment of those trained and born through their ancestry as a part of this Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is perfectly clear that I was right, and the conclusion which the Senator from Idaho drew from his premises was that it was unwise to extend to these voters the further power and privilege to elect directly Senators of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; that is right.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite right. Now, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; and I will answer the question, but I do not want to go off into that field of argument.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator answers me I want to add to it another question, which I am sure he will be willing to answer at the same time. He believes that the legislatures of the several States are better fitted to elect Senators than the voters in their primary capacity. I have no doubt he believes that honestly. I suppose he has fair respect for the present membership of the Senate of the United States, has he not?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator had better withdraw that question. It implies that I do not.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. And a Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. No; on the contrary——

Mr. HEYBURN (continuing). Who will stand here and attack the ability or integrity of a fellow Member is not a man to be heard on this floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, it implies that he has the respect of which the Senator spoke. It was simply a prelude to the further question, which is, How many Senators now sitting in the Senate of the United States were, in fact, selected by the legislatures of their several States and how many are the choice of these same voters expressed in some form of primary?

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well; I will find out. Does the Senator from Iowa represent the will of the people of Iowa? I will commence and I will catechise a few Members and find out whether any of them will acknowledge that they are not here by virtue of the exercise of an honest judgment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will answer the Senator from Idaho, althought I am sure if he would simply recur to the laws of the several States he would know what proportion of the membership of this body has been in fact selected by the legislatures. Now, answering for myself, I will say that I was selected by a primary vote in my State, and, in my opinion, if I had not made many, many struggles before the primary voters of my State and if I had depended simply upon the will or wish of a legislature, brought together as legislatures are ordinarily brought together, I never would have been in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will not join with the Senator from Iowa in discrediting the State of Iowa or the legislature of it. I will not accept the statement of the Senator from Iowa that the Legislature of Iowa is corrupt or was corrupt, or that the State of Iowa is not capable of selecting an honest legislature.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have said nothing of that sort. I only say it would have selected, probably, had not the influence of the primary been brought upon it, some other man to represent it in the Senate of the United States, and that man——

Mr. HEYBURN. Some bad man?

Mr. CUMMINS. That man might have represented the State far better than I can possibly represent it; but I am not going to admit it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would they have selected some bad man for the Senate?

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope not, Mr. President, but the chances are that he would have been a man holding different views from those which I hold.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would the Senator object to placing in a receptacle of some kind the names of the Senators who, in his judgment, are not entitled to seats on this floor?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho is illogical, as he generally is, and facetious, as he always is. I have not suggested that the legislatures of the several States who have elected men without the interference or influence of a primary have not elected good men, but the Senator from Idaho is insisting throughout a long course of argument that if the voters of the United States be permitted to say who shall be their Senators then this body will be overrun by a crowd of incompetent and unfit and rash and socialistic and radical men who have no proper views of government. I am simply recalling to his attention the fact that the people of this country, in despair of amending the Constitution, have accomplished this reform for themselves.

Mr. HEYBURN. Like a burglar.

Mr. CUMMINS. In an irregular way, I agree, but they have accomplished it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Like a burglar.

Mr. CUMMINS. And they have accomplished it so effectively that, whether the Constitution is amended or not, the people in many or most of the States will choose their own Senators.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator has made an assertion as to what I have said that has no foundation and will not be found in any record on earth, not even in an irresponsible newspaper—that is, that the people of the United States are incompetent——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am going to retract if I have made any such statement.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator makes that statement. He says I have stated that if the people elected Senators they would be incompetents. I use the word "incompetents" to include all the various designations that he used. I have said nothing of the kind, here or elsewhere, and I believe nothing of the kind. The Senator made that statement and then rushed along to another subject not germane to it, so that I might, perchance—I do not mean that he did it with that idea—but so that I might, perchance, overlook the fact that he charged me with entertaining and expressing views that I have never entertained and expressed. I have confidence in the people of the United States that they have too much sense to change the Constitution of the United States, and that will be impressed upon the memory of the Senator from Iowa and upon the memory of all Senators. This body of 92 men may demand a change in the Constitution, but the people of the United States, the composite wisdom of the people of the United States, will not justify them nor support them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. That, Mr. President, is a matter for the future. But if I have misunderstood the Senator from Idaho, I am quick to express my regret for the misunderstanding and my great pleasure to discover that I did misunderstand him. If the Senator from Idaho believes, as he now says, that the people of this country can wisely and safely and patriotically elect their Senators, then, of course, the whole argument is at an end.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the American people are capable of maintaining a good government and of selecting wise, intelligent men to exercise the right of government for them. They elect to the other House of Congress men who in character and ability are the equals of the men who occupy seats in this Chamber; and I have never intimated, and no man can charge me with ever having said, that the people are not capable of selecting wisely when they choose their representatives. I have talked about the States and I have talked about the manner in which the people in the States could best exercise their duty to choose Members of this body. I do not necessarily condemn every other man; I do not necessarily have to abandon an existing provision of the Constitution merely because some other provision might be made or might work equally well. Is this attempt to amend the Constitution simply an experiment to see whether or not something else might not do as well? Is that a sufficient motive; is that a sufficient reason for the amendment of the Constitution? They have brought in this proposition and then go out to seek for reasons and justification for it.

This measure is not in response to the constitutional number of States who may require us to act or who may act upon this question. Suppose, for instance, as the law provides, a jury of 12 men shall be summoned to try a cause. If 11 of them are of one opinion, does that justify the rendering of a verdict? Would the court receive the verdict because it represented the sentiment of the majority?

The Constitution says that we may propose amendments to the people. That is the subject under discussion; but Senators have continually forced upon our attention the fact that a certain number of States, less than the constitutional number, have demanded a change in the method of electing Senators.

If one less than the constitutional number demands it, it does not justify our action on the ground that the people have demanded it. It requires the constitutional number of States to express an opinon upon which we may act. A jury can not render a verdict upon the judgment of 11 men, nor can we act under the claim of justification by public demand unless that proportion of the public named in the Constitution demands the change. There has never been a time when the constitutional demand for the proposed amendment has been made upon Congress. There are to-day not to exceed 19 States which have asked Congress to take this action. Congress does not require any demand, but Senators here place their claim for support upon this alleged demand of the States. When a sufficient number of States come to Congress demanding a constitutional change, I would be the last man in the world to stand here and oppose it, for it is a constitutional right; but until they do, I do not propose to be dragooned into the support of a measure under the pretense that it is in answer to a popular demand, when there is no demand that should appeal to us. When Senators vote for a proposed constitutional amendment such as is before us, they must do so on their judgment, and the Senator who does not do so on his judgment is not justified in doing so at all.

The people, however, will have a chance to deal with this question; and as this is the last time that I expect to speak upon it at this session of Congress, and I hope forever, I have felt impelled to present the views that I have expressed this afternoon. Let it go out to the people of this country that you are proposing to experiment with the Constitution and to make a change for which there is no sufficient reason—a change that is a charge in itself against the integrity and ability of the people who select the State legislatures—and they will resent it.

You are going to send the proposed amendment to the discredited tribunals, the legislatures of the States who, you say, are not fit to select Senators, and yet those legislatures are to pass upon this question. Are they better fitted by intelligence or integrity to pass upon the wisdom of this amendment to the Constitution than they are to pass upon the selection of a United States Senator?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask, Is there any other body to which we can submit this question for ratification? If we could submit it direct to the people, I should be very glad to do so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, inasmuch as it ought not to be submitted at all, I do not think I need go out and hunt some person to whom to submit it. But does the Senator remember that in history he is told that the makers of the Constitution submitted it to the legislatures of the States? Were those legislatures fit to pass upon the creation of the Constitution and all that is in it? Of course it was ratified by the legislatures of the States. How does the Senator suppose it was ratified?

Mr. BORAH. It was ratified by conventions elected for that purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was left to the States, and the legislatures created the conventions. Were those legislatures, those incompetent, corrupt, inefficient bodies selected from the best citizenship of the States fit to create conventions? Are those legislatures to be discredited because they are not fit, are not competent, can not be trusted to elect Senators, when every Member of this body was elected by a legislature? Is there any Senator here who will dare send back home the message that the legislature which elected him was corrupt and inefficient? It might probably affect his return.

I should like to see some Senator rise in his seat and say that the legislature of his State which elected him was not competent, was not fit, was not honest enough to be trusted. [Laughter.] Then I should be interested to see him go back and say "I am a candidate for reelection." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the next time I speak upon this question it will be to the people in the States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 7, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, author of our being and bestower of every good gift, we lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee for all Thy favors, and we most fervently pray that Thy spirit may so completely possess us that it may crowd out of our being all evil desires and sinful propensities, that we may hallow Thy name in all that we undertake this day, that no sorrows, no regrets shall follow in its wake to disturb our peace and happiness, and we will ascribe all praise to Thee through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would desire to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee what it is about.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce to the House that this is Calendar Wednesday, and no business is in order except a motion to dispense with it or to take up the business that comes up on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have consulted with the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the minority, and we have agreed between ourselves that the business on the calendar is not of such great importance as makes it necessary to call it up to-day, and I therefore move to dispense with the business of Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to dispense with the business on Wednesday's calendar.

The question was taken, and, in the judgment of the Chair two-thirds having voted therefor, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to recognize another gentleman from Tennessee first, and then he will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee.

STATISTICS IN REGARD TO SCHEDULE K.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit the following privileged report (No. 48) from the Committee on Ways and Means on House resolution 177.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee submits a report on a privileged matter, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 177.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the House of Representatives, for the use of the Members thereof, all the information secured and the tables and statistics prepared by the board of experts, composed of Henry C. Emery, James B. Reynolds, Alvin H. Sanders, William M. Howard, and Thomas W. Page, relating to the various articles and commodities named in Schedule K of the act approved August 5, 1909, being "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," and relating to wool and manufactures thereof.

The report was read as follows:

Mr. HULL, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report:

"The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred House resolution 177, calling on the President to transmit to the House of Representatives certain data and statistics relating to Schedule K of the existing tariff law, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report with the recommendation that it do pass."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I anticipate that the purpose of this resolution is so self-evident as to make any discussion of its object unnecessary, but it is perhaps not improper to briefly discuss the propriety of its passage at this time. I do not know much about the details of the tariff, but such ideas as I have about the tariff in general are fairly well defined. I recognize that great line of demarcation which separates the ideas and ideals in tariff legislation of gentlemen on that side of the aisle and the ideas and ideals of gentlemen on this side of the aisle. I recognize, of course, the fundamental difference in principle between a tariff levied primarily for protection and a tariff levied primarily for revenue, but I have come to regard the levying of the tariff whatever the underlying and basic principal as an economic rather than a political problem, and as one which should be solved in the light of a full, complete, accurate, and scientific knowledge of the facts and with due regard to the definitely ascertained necessities of our industrial institutions. It is conceded on every side that whatever the basic political principle involved in levying the tariff may be the inevitable consequence is that certain industries receive a benefit in the way of protection and that a practically corresponding burden is imposed upon the people. These advantages ought not to be extended or these burdens imposed without accurate knowledge of their propriety or necessity. Great injustice and great inequalities must necessarily result from such a course.

In my optimistic moments I have hoped that the time would come when tariff bills would be measured and their merits or demerits determined, not altogether by the height of the wall erected against foreign competition or the amount of revenue raised by them but rather by the justice and equality which characterized the distribution of their benefits and burdens, when accurate information would make possible the scientific adjustment of the tariff to known industrial necessities and the conservation of the welfare of the whole people. I have believed and still believe that the creation of a board of tariff experts would greatly assist in obtaining such information.

The employment of the present board of experts was authorized by the tariff act of August 5, 1909. The continuance of the board was insured by an appropriation contained in the sundry civil act approved March 4, 1911, which provided in part—

To enable the President to secure information to assist him in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, and the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws, including such investigations of the cost of production of commodities, covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of such cost of production as are authorized by said act, and including the employment of such persons as may be required for those purposes; and to enable him to do any and all things in connection therewith authorized by law, or if a tariff board be established by law then for the purpose of meeting the expenditures authorized by the law, $225,000, together with the balance unexpended July 1 next of the appropriation made for these purposes for the fiscal year 1911.

I want to call particular attention to the next paragraph:

The Tariff Board, if established by law, shall make report to each House of the Congress on the wool and woolen schedule not later than the first Monday in December, 1911.

This paragraph is not applicable to or binding upon the existing board of experts, but I am informed that the board has for several months been engaged in gathering the necessary information to enable them to comply with this provision of the law. I am frank to say that I do not know what or how much information the board has gathered on the wool schedule, but I do contend that the Congress of the United States and the country are entitled now, when we are about to enter upon a revision of the wool schedule, to have such information and statistics as the board has gathered on that schedule.

The wool schedule is one of the most important of the tariff schedules. It requires a very high degree of technical and accurate information in its revision. We ought to have at least such information as is now available upon it. We should have that information now, when it will be of some use.

Now, it may be claimed that the Tariff Board has not completed its investigation and ought not to be required to report at this time for that reason. But, conceding that the investigation is not completed, that fact ought not—and, I am sure, will not—affect the accuracy of the information thus far obtained or the propriety of considering that information in connection with the proposed revision of the wool schedule.

The report of the Tariff Board will not in any event be binding upon Congress. It will only be considered for whatever it may show itself to be worth. If it contains information which tends even in a slight degree to assist the Congress in equalizing the burdens which the proposed wool schedule must inevitably impose upon the people, it will have been justified.

For the considerations which I have thus briefly urged I trust the resolution will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, if no other gentlemen desire time to discuss the resolution, I shall ask for a vote.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HULL. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I only want to ask the gentleman a question. This resolution provides that the President shall forward such information as the Tariff Board may have already obtained with regard to Schedule K. Does not the act creating the Tariff Board provide that the report of that board shall come in in a regular way about the 1st of December?

Mr. HULL. As I recall the provisions of that act, there is no specific time designated in which the report shall be made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the passage of this resolution at this time tend to delay the complete work of the Tariff Board with regard to Schedule K? That is to say, if taken away from its duties of investigation and made to report in a partial way at this time, will it not delay the general work that Congress committed to the Tariff Board?

Mr. HULL. I am unable to see how it could operate to delay the work of the board. They are understood to have been engaged on it for some months, and they are, of course, familiar with the progress of a similar investigation here, and that they would doubtless be expected to furnish the House with such available information and facts as they had acquired up to this time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman whether there is reason to believe, on the part of the proponent of this resolution or of the committee reporting it, that the Tariff Board is now prepared to report in full its investigations upon Schedule K?

Mr. HULL. I can only say that it would be natural to believe that after several months' work in this connection the board would have some tangible facts and data compiled that would be of some value in connection with this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think that the preparation of the partial report called for by this resolution would not impede the regular work of the Tariff Board, as provided by the act creating the board?

Mr. HULL. I do not think so. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

TOBACCO TRUST PROSECUTIONS.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report (No. 49) from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama brings up a privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 193.

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the House of Representatives for its information—

Whether any criminal prosecutions have been begun or been had against the American Tobacco Co., or any of its constituent companies or associations, or any of the corporations, companies, or associations constituting what is commonly called the Tobacco Trust, or against any of the individuals connected with or associated with the American Tobacco Co., or any of its constituent companies or associations, or connected with or associated with any of the corporations, companies, or associations constituting what is commonly called the Tobacco Trust, for violation of any provision of the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; and, if not, why such criminal prosecutions have not been begun or been had; and

Whether any criminal prosecutions are contemplated by the Department of Justice against the American Tobacco Co., or any of its constituent companies or associations, or any of the corporations, companies, or associations constituting what is commonly called the Tobacco Trust, or against any of the individuals connected with or associated with the American Tobacco Co., or any of its constituent companies or associations, or connected with or associated with any of the corporations, companies, or associations constituting what is commonly called the Tobacco Trust, for violation of any provision of the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; and, if not, why such criminal prosecutions should not be had.

The report (by Mr. CLAYTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration House resolution 193, directing the Attorney General to furnish information regarding criminal prosecutions against the American Tobacco Co., and report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on this.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves a point of order.

Mr. MANN. The resolution is subject to a point of order, although I see no reason myself why it should not be passed.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then I hope the gentleman will waive the point of order, thus avoid a debate, and let us pass the resolution at once.

Mr. MANN. I intend to waive the point of order, unless someone else desires to raise it. I withdraw the point of order, although I will say to the gentleman that resolutions asking for reasons are subject to a point of order.

Mr. CLAYTON. Inasmuch as the gentleman has waived it, I do not care to debate that point of order, though I am prepared to debate it, and I do not think the resolution is subject to the point of order suggested by the gentleman. He has, however, contributed to my happiness, and, I doubt not, to the happiness of the House, by waiving the point of order and permitting the resolution to be passed at once.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order; but I will say to the gentleman that it has been repeatedly held that to ask a department for reasons was not asking for information, and was not privileged.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

SPEECH OF PRESIDENT TAFT AT CHICAGO.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the address of President Taft before the Western Economic Society at Chicago June 3 be printed as a House document and placed in the folding room to the credit of the Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the President's speech before the Western Economic Society at Chicago last Saturday night be printed as a public document and placed in the folding room to the credit of the Members.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, who makes that request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. CANNON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if this is by caucus action? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. It is certainly without caucus opposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that that speech has already been ordered printed as a Senate document. I will ask him whether he wants it printed as a House document, or 5,000 extra copies of the Senate document?

Mr. SIMS. I did not know that it had been printed as a Senate document, but whichever way will be the most economical and desirable will be satisfactory to me. I care not so that the House gets the 5,000 copies.

Mr. MANN. I suppose it makes no great difference, although it is not customary to order Senate documents reprinted as House documents.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Might I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee to have printed and attached to this speech the editorial in the Commoner by Mr. Bryan?

Mr. SIMS. I have not seen the editorial referred to, but I presume it is a worthy document. I am willing to take that up with the gentleman later. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield to me?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMS. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he makes this proposition of his own volition?

Mr. SIMS. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Without suggestion?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; without suggestion. I did ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] if he had any objection, and he said he had none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I observed in the newspaper this morning that the gentleman was about to do this gracious act, and I thought he might inform us if he did it of his own free will.

Mr. SIMS. Of my own unrestrained will, as I have stated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman asked that these go to the folding room. Why not put them in the document room, where they can be had just as well by Members?

Mr. SIMS. I want to send them out to my constituents and to such persons as feel interested enough to ask for them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some Members may not care to have them. Some equally good Democratic speeches have been made on the same subject.

Mr. SIMS. As far as I am concerned, I am more anxious to have them printed and read than to have them placed in any particular place.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a moment?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I take it that this speech has already received a reading by many people in the Republic. So far as I have noticed, there has been no speech made within my recollection that has been so universally sent by the press dispatches and so universally printed in the metropolitan papers, having in the aggregate many, many millions of subscribers. I shall not object to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee, but as a public document to be sent out at the expense of the Government, after the vast publicity that has already been given to it, there is a query whether it will not be like many other public documents—antiquated before it is received. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, or any subcommittee thereof, may have the privilege of sitting during the sessions of the House. (H. Res. 198.)

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, or any subcommittee thereof, have leave to sit during the sessions of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Did not the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules authorize this work to go on during the sessions of the House?

Mr. HAMLIN. That was only to sit during vacation.

Mr. GARRETT. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11019, a bill to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on this bill may have five days after the vote on the bill is taken to extend and revise their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Five legislative days or five calendar days?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11019, a bill to revise the wool schedule, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that all Members who speak on this bill shall have five legislative days after the bill is voted upon in which to print remarks on the same. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] whether he thinks that would permit the insertion very liberally in speeches that are extended and not delivered of such language as "applause," "wild and tumultuous applause," and language of that character? I notice in a speech that was printed in the RECORD the other day the statement was made amidst applause, "Jesus was born in a manger, and John the Baptist fed on locusts and wild honey." Mr. Speaker, I had not supposed that a statement of that kind was so new to Members of the House that it was needed to be received with applause. I do not know whether it was received with applause, though I apprehend that the word "applause" in that place and various other places in that speech or other speeches was inserted not by the reporters of the House, but by some other gentleman. Now, I have no objection to gentlemen who speak having the right to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD in a legitimate way, but it seems to me that when we grant the right in this way there ought to be some limitation upon the propriety of the extension and the insertions in the speech, and unless such proprieties can be observed when such a request is made hereafter I shall object.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] ought to read that language without naming the page of the RECORD on which it appeared, so that we may identify the Member, for it is a sort of reflection on all of the Members of this House if such things appear. I am apprehensive that something of that kind may have appeared in my remarks that I may have made [laughter], although I have never had any connection with anything of that kind. I think that every Member who is not guilty ought to escape, and the gentleman ought to identify the speech.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that would be the proper thing to do. I think those things, when they have been inserted in the RECORD in the past, have been inserted through innocence, not with any intention of doing a wrong or an improper thing, and that it is sufficient to call the attention of Members of the House to such a situation without making any specific discrimination.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman kindly tell us whether the word he used is spelled i-n-n-o-c-e-n-c-e or i-n-n-o-c-e-n-t-s? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Well, I said "innocence."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion, I desire to submit a further request for unanimous consent, that the debate on this bill shall be equally divided between the two sides of the House, one-half of the time to be controlled by myself and one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, I desire to state that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has gone home ill. He had some observations that he wanted to make upon this bill, and it was agreed between him and the gentleman from Alabama that they should be inserted by unanimous consent. I ask the gentleman from Alabama that he couple that with his request and that those remarks, which I will hand in to the reporters, may be inserted after the opening speech is made on that subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from New York that I will submit that as a separate request as soon as I get through this other.

Mr. PAYNE. Very well.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MADISON. I would like to inquire if the gentleman expects to submit any request with regard to the limitation of general debate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at this time.

Mr. MADISON. May I be pardoned if I suggest that a request of that kind be preferred, and that general debate be limited to a short period of time, say, for instance, three days, and that then we have real discussion at the only time when the Members of the House are present and when real discussion counts—that is, under the five-minute rule? Now, will the gentleman indulge me for just a minute more?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MADISON. I think all Members want to hear the gentleman from Alabama. They want to hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and a few others on each side, men who have studied these questions and who can give real information. For instance, this morning one of the important committees of the House, a special investigating committee, adjourned in order that we might be here and hear those gentlemen, but gentlemen understand that after those gentlemen have been heard the general debate in the House is largely a farce, and that the only people here listening to the discussion are those who are waiting opportunity to speak. Now, under those circumstances I hope to be pardoned for making the suggestion that the time of the general debate be short, and that the time for discussion under the five-minute rule, when all Members are here and when discussion will be effective, be extended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that I consider this a very important measure. I think there ought to be latitude for reasonable debate on both sides of the House. I do not think three days is long enough to allow Members to express their views who wish to enter into general debate. I hope that we can finish general debate within a week, but I have no desire to cut off any gentlemen who desire reasonable debate. Now, as to the five-minute rule I have no objection in the world to a reasonable consideration and debate under the five-minute rule provided it does not border on a filibuster. I will state that when other bills have been before the House and 50 or 80 amendments have been offered I have arisen and moved to close debate because I was compelled to do so because amendments were offered to the same point, were aimed at the same purpose, and I did not believe that they were resulting in bringing any light before the country or offered with any expectation of being passed.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In a minute; but I have no desire when the five-minute rule is reached on this bill to unduly limit debate under the five-minute rule, providing it is apparent to the House that the amendments offered are for the purpose of presenting a real fact relating to the bill to the country and are not in the nature of a filibuster.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. For a question? Has not this bill as presented to the House already been adopted by a Democratic caucus?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Democratic Party has presented the bill, and the Democratic Party is a unit in this House and will vote for the bill as a unit.

Mr. DALZELL. Without amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, this is satisfactory to them; why should they amend their bill?

Mr. DALZELL. I merely wanted some light thrown upon the effectiveness of the five-minute debate.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama if my constituents and the constituents of other Members here are not as much entitled to hear from us at home as the constituents of these old Members.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And we ask that privilege.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I have already stated to the gentleman from Kansas, and I will state it again to the gentleman from Georgia, I have no desire to limit debate on this proposition, unreasonably limit debate. I do not intend to do so. I have already made that statement.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Are not the new Members more subject to criticism in the revision of speeches than older Members, if there is the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" in the revision, or if the speech is longer than the time limit indicates, 5, 10, or 15 minutes yielded to a new Member, though his time may have been extended? We want time, and we want the RECORD to show it. These little things are not noted, so far as the old Members are concerned, but the new Member suffers.

There is certainly nothing personal to the gentleman from Alabama or anyone else in these questions. The gentleman from Alabama is always fair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Probably that is so, but there has been no disposition on my part, up to this time, in the handling of these bills to limit debate or not to yield time that was requested by gentlemen on this side of the House or gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I grant that the gentleman is very fair.

Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MANN. I have no complaint to make with reference to the latitude of debate that the gentleman has allowed, even though he has referred to my amendments to the free-list bill as filibustering. [Laughter.] They were not, at all. But I suggest to the gentleman that on that occasion and on this occasion, when the bill is read, there is no special reason why a majority of the House should insist upon reading the bill under the five-minute rule and concluding the reading in one day. The House might easily take more than a day under the five-minute rule. Of course, we all recognize that the debate under the five-minute rule is at least more interesting, if not more instructive, than the general debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the chairman of any committee having a bill before this House has got to be governed by circumstances, but, so far as I am concerned, I have no desire to unduly cut off debate, either on the general debate or debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. I believe that there is no intention on the part of the gentleman to limit debate.

Mr. CANDLER. The gentleman means that the same method will be followed here as was followed in the discussion of the free-list bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen desiring to interrupt a Member who has the floor will first address the Chair and obtain the permission of the Member having the floor.

The gentleman from Alabama asks that the time be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the time to be equally divided. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have a further request to submit. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] was called away on account of sickness in his family. He had a statement that he desired to incorporate in the RECORD which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has in his hand. He desires to have it printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Request is made that a statement prepared by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TURNBULL, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of sickness.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill H. R. 11019, the bill to remodel Schedule K.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11019. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of January, 1912, the articles hereinafter enumerated, described, and provided for shall, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the Islands of Guam and Tutuila), be subjected to the duties hereinafter provided, and no others; that is to say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, in presenting this bill to the House, we distinctly draw the dividing line between the two great political parties in this country from the standpoint on which they write tariff bills to obtain revenue to support the Government.

The Republican Party, as declared in their platform, presents tariff legislation for the purpose of levying duties at rates that will equal the difference in cost at home and abroad and at the same time protect a reasonable profit to the American manufacturers.

Their declaration is primarily in favor of levying tariffs in the interest of the great manufacturing classes of this country. The question of raising revenue is incidental to levying a tax to prevent foreign competition.

The Democratic Party does not believe that any interest in this country is entitled primarily to the fostering care of the Government of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We realize that the revenue to run this Government must be raised, and that the Constitution of the United States authorizes the Congress to levy duties on foreign goods imported into this country for the purpose of raising that revenue. The primary purpose from the beginning, with those who believe in the principles of the Democratic Party, is to levy these taxes for the purpose of suplying the revenue of the Government, and if any protection arises from the levying of these taxes it is a mere incident which grows out of the constitutional warrant given by the people to levy taxes at the customhouse, but they are not levied for the purpose of fostering one man's business at the expense of another. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So the criticism of this bill that may be made by gentlemen on the other side of the House, that certain manufacturing interests in this country are not allowed sufficient protection is a matter that marks the dividing line between the two great parties, and is not applicable to this bill in particular.

We disclaim any purpose whatever of writing this bill in the interests of the manufacturers of wool or the producers of raw wool. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic bills are the only tariff measures that have been presented to this House in a quarter of a century that have not come at the dictation of special interests that sought the fostering care of the United States Government to build up their business, and this bill is the most competitive of the Democratic measures. This bill comes before this House at the dictation of no special interest but as a result of the conclusions of the representatives of the American people looking solely to the raising of sufficient revenue for the needs of the Government.

We state in the report upon this bill that we have levied a tax on raw wool and on manufactured wool because of the exigencies of the Government and the necessity of providing for a depleted and depleting condition of the Treasury. The gentlemen on the Ways and Means Committee who represent the Republican side of the House take issue with us on that question, and in their minority views make this statement:

The statement as to the condition of the Treasury here given is absolutely false, as proved by Treasury daily statements. On May 31, the day before this caucus, there was an actual surplus of receipts over disbursements for the past 11 months of the fiscal year which will end the 30th day of this month of June of $6,875,914.37.

Now, the statement in this report to which they object is the following, which will be found on page 26:

The bill H. R. 11019 is not to be construed as an abandonment of any Democratic policy; but in view of the Democratic platform for a "gradual reduction of the tariff," and of the depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury, a result of Republican extravagance, a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool is now proposed as a revenue necessity.

I am satisfied that if you will listen to me I can demonstrate to you that every word of that statement is absolutely true. We say "Republican extravagance." When did the Republican Party come into control of this Government the last time? In the year 1897, at the close of Mr. Cleveland's administration. The total amount of revenue that was necessary for us to raise at that time was only $347,721,000. The total amount of revenue that you are raising to-day, with a deficit in the Treasury, is $675,511,000, as shown by the Treasury report of last year. You have increased the taxes on the American people in that time 94 per cent, with an increase in population of only 28 per cent and in wealth of 31 per cent.

In the year 1897, when the Democratic Party went out of power, the per capita tax levied on the American people amounted to $4.85. The per capita tax that you levied on the American people last year amounted to $7.35.

With an increase in population and wealth of only 28 per cent and an increase in taxes of 94 per cent, can you deny the charge that Republican extravagance has produced a depleting condition of the Public Treasury? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But the gentlemen seek to show in their report that, notwithstanding the increase in taxes put on the American people, the Treasury is not in a depleting condition, and that the revenues to-day are in a better condition than they were last year. They refer to a Treasury statement to sustain their minority views.

I hold in my hand the statement of the United States Treasury at the close of business June 5, 1911. It came to us all in the mail this morning, and what does it show? It shows that for the year 1910—the fiscal year ending the 30th day of last June—the ordinary receipts of this Government were $675,511,000, and the ordinary disbursements of this Government, which exclude, of course, the disbursements in reference to the Panama Canal and the bonded indebtedness, amounted to $659,705,000.

This Treasury statement says—and it does not present our figures, for these are prepared by the department of a Republican administration—that the ordinary receipts for this fiscal year amount to $625,071,000, as against $675,511,000 last year, a difference of about $50,000,000. Is there any gentleman on that side of the House who can say that this does not show a depleting condition of the Public Treasury—a falling off in the ordinary receipts? What does ordinary receipts mean? It means those receipts which the Government gets from customhouses, the moneys it receives from internal-revenue taxes and from miscellaneous sources, including all receipts except from the sale of Government bonds. This report shows that you are to-day, or will be at the end of this fiscal year on the 1st day of next July, about $50,000,000 behind the receipts of last year.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman turn to the second page in that Treasury statement—I suppose it is the ordinary daily statement?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. And read there that the receipts up to date for this fiscal year are more by several millions of dollars than they were up to date last year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not see that in the figures, because I have not got——

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman will find it if he looks for it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Here is what it says to this date: For the fiscal year the receipts are $604,000,000. Now, I have not before me the statement showing what they were up to the 5th of June, 1910, but what I do say is that your Republican administration, the Treasury Department of the United States, says that you will be about $50,000,000 behind the receipts of last year when you reach the 1st day of July next. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yet you say we are not warranted in making the statement that there is a depleting condition in the Treasury.

Mr. PAYNE. It must be the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made last December from which the gentleman reads, when he was predicting what the receipts would or might be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I am not reading from that.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, yes; and when the Treasury Department publishes daily and sends to every Member of the House who wants it the receipts up to date for each year there is no excuse for the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in making such a statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I have here in hand is my excuse for making it and it can not be denied. If the gentleman wants to see it, he can send here and get the paper. It is the daily statement, the last one issued by the Treasury Department [applause on the Democratic side], bearing date June 5, and it says that you are going to be $50,000,000 behind at the end of this fiscal year. Now, if that is not a depleting condition of the Public Treasury, I do not know what it is. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I read from the statement which the gentleman hands me that the ordinary receipts for this fiscal year up to this date in June are $625,071,413.90, and in the next column to this date last fiscal year, $604,048,177. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, as I stated to the gentleman repeatedly, it is not shown to this date whether there is going to be a deficit. I gave the ordinary receipts for the entire fiscal year of last year, and it is here in the column $675,511,000. The gentleman does not deny that the ordinary receipts were $675,000,000?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I challenge any man on that side of the House to get that statement and read it, in view of the gentleman's speech, and say whether I am right or not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, the gentleman is trying to prove his case by taking a particular period and comparing it with a year. The gentleman can not deny that the ordinary receipts of this Government from taxation sources were $675,000,000 last year. Does he deny that?

Mr. PAYNE. I have not the statement before me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, here it is.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose the gentleman knows that the tax from corporations is due this month, and that it amounts, on the assessments, to $28,500,000, due before the 30th day of June. I suppose he knows that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose your Secretary of the Treasury, when he made his estimates of the amount of receipts he was going to get this year, had sense enough to figure that in if he knew it was coming due. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Why, no man has sense enough to be a prophet. No man can prophesy and put that against the actual figures returned up to this date. Mr. Chairman, if that is the kind of information that was fed to the Democratic caucus, I have no wonder that they indorsed this bill and indorsed that statement. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can repudiate the Treasury Department if he wants to, but he can not deny that the Treasury Department figures of last year showed receipts of $675,511,000 from taxation sources, and he can not deny that the Treasurer of the United States says that the receipts for this fiscal year will be only $625,071,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to state the estimate was the receipts of the entire fiscal year would be $625,071,000. What are they up to date?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are $604,048,000 up to date.

Mr. MANN. No; that is last year's receipts.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Those are last year's receipts—up to date this year I have not got the figures.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; they are in the statement.

Mr. PAYNE. They are right there in the statement.

Mr. MANN. $625,071,000 up to date.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They can not be $625,071,000 up to date, because I will read what the statement says:

> This fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, ordinary receipts and disbursements total $625,071,000.

Does not that mean up to the 30th of June?

Mr. MANN. It means, of course, the receipts and expenditures up to June 5, 1911, as I recall it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not on this paper.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is on the paper and gives the actual receipts up to June 5, and is greater than what the gentleman states will be the entire receipts for the year ending June 30, a whole month in which to collect receipts, including the corporation tax. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman does not read the figures as I do. Now, wait a minute; I want to go one step further in this proposition. The gentleman says there is not a depleting condition of the Treasury. This statement shows that the excess of disbursements over all receipts for the fiscal year 1910 amounted to $19,480,000. The Secretary of the Treasury says that for the year ending June 30, 1911, the excess of disbursements over receipts will amount to $20,216,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is what this paper shows. I do not know whether the Secretary of the Treasury is correct or not, but I am justified in assuming that he is, and I was justified in assuming that he was when we prepared this bill. Now, more than that——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, one more question and then I will quit. The gentleman assumes that the Secretary's prophesy in last December as to the amount of income for this fiscal year for six months ahead is more reliable and better data than when June has come around and the Secretary states the actual results, which the gentleman from Alabama does not rely upon. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, the gentleman is still wedded to the child of his brain and I can not help it. Now, I want to call attention, though, that this goes to show the depleted condition of the Treasury because of the failure of the Payne tariff law to produce the revenue necessary to support the Government.

Mr. PAYNE. But the gentleman can not show it by the figures at any time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will if the gentleman will allow me; of course, it is very easy for a gentleman to deny facts——

Mr. PAYNE. I refer the gentleman to the official record.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). And if the gentleman will be silent for a moment I will give him a statement in reference to this very schedule that has been furnished me by the Treasury Department. Last year, due to the fact that the President of the United States said there would be a revision of the tariff downward, and the people of the United States, believing that the taxes levied at the customhouse would not be as great after the new tariff law was enacted as they were before, importations were held back awaiting the result of that tariff legislation. Instead of a revision downward we had a revision upward, and those delayed importations had to come in during the fiscal year 1910 and so swelled the returns for that year of the Payne tariff law.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman if he does not like me to do so——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say it would require the gentleman a week to make proof of the fact the revision was upward of the present tariff law; and when he got through it would demonstrate the falsity of his statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, I will not fall out with the gentleman; I think the country has found a verdict. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman that the country has obtained its misleading information from statements made by the gentlemen on the other side. The country got it from just such false statements as are now made by the gentleman on that side. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Presumably so, because they were his facts, and I challenge gentlemen who are at all familiar with statistics on that side of the House to sit down and figure out that question, and if they are honest men they will say that what I now say is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I am not going to fall out with the gentleman because the favorite child of his brain is dying to-day. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. No; the gentleman's "favorite child" is good for two years longer at least, and I think it will outlast that of the gentleman from Alabama. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to call the attention of the gentlemen to the statement of the Treasury Department in reference to Schedule K. Now, mark you, of the taxes levied at the customhouses Schedule K produces the greatest amount of any of the schedules except Schedule E (sugar, molasses, and manufactures of) and Schedule J (hemp, jute, and flax goods). Schedule K produces 12.83 per cent of all the taxes that come in at the customhouses, and when this important schedule is falling off in its receipts very largely it is a clear indication of what is happening to the other schedules in the Payne tariff law.

I asked the Bureau of Statistics to send me a statement as to the receipts under Schedule K for the first three-quarters of this fiscal year. The report came from Mr. O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, and I think gentlemen on that side of the House will take that report as the authority of the Government. He stated that Schedule K for the first quarter of this fiscal year raised $8,932,000; for the second quarter ending December 31, 1910, $6,895,000; and for the third quarter ending March 3, 1911, $7,766,000; showing that the receipts under the schedule have been dropping off as we get away from the dam that was created against importations by the promise of the Republican Party that they would revise the tariff downward.

Now, assuming that the receipts for the last quarter of the fiscal year are the largest received by the Government in any quarter, to wit, $8,922,000, and adding that amount to the first three quarters of the year, you have as the total receipts of Schedule K for this fiscal year $32,490,000, against $41,000,000 in the last fiscal year. Is not that a depleting condition of the Public Treasury?

The Ways and Means Committee in preparing this bill to present it to the House was hedged in by certain limitations. The President of the United States had said that the wise way to revise the tariff was in detail, schedule by schedule. The Democratic Party had stood for that position years ago. We believed that we could more intelligently present to this House and to the country a revision of the tariff by bringing in one schedule at a time than by throwing before the House the work of an entire tariff bill. But in revising the tariff schedule by schedule our hands were bound by certain limitations. Our first pledge is to the Government of the United States, not to protected manufacturers. It is our duty to produce the revenue that is necessary to run this Government, now administered by a Republican Executive. We are not responsible for the Republican Executive. We hope that the people of the United States will not be responsible for a Republican Executive two years from now. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But the condition to-day is that Republican extravagance has piled up expenditures that a Democratic Congress must meet.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RUSSELL). Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Was not the President's suggestion that the tariff should be revised schedule by schedule coupled with the suggestion that it should be revised schedule by schedule with the aid of reports from time to time from the Tariff Board?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the gentleman is mistaken. That may be something added to the President's statement.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Was not that a part of the President's suggestion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not the President's suggestion before me.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman stated the President's suggestion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I repeat that I haven't it before me, but my recollection of the President's statement was that it did not contain that language. I am not sure about it. I will not make an assertion about which I am not positive.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Has the gentleman's committee had any report from the Tariff Board before it in relation to this schedule?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad to answer the gentleman's question. I did not intend to go into that matter at this time, but I will say that I voted for a Tariff Board, not this present one. I am willing to receive all the information I can get, but if there has been a monumental failure in the legislation of this Government it was the creation of the Tariff Board that works under the direction of the White House to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman kindly file a bill of particulars wherein the Tariff Board has failed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I have filed that bill of particulars. I hold it in my hand.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What is it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The President of the United States told me that he would be glad to have the Tariff Board furnish me any information they had in reference to these tariff bills. Does the gentleman doubt that the President of the United States was honest when he said that?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No; therefore I inquired whether the gentleman had had any information.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, if the gentleman wants the information that the Tariff Board furnished on this wool schedule, I will refer him to Appendix C, which begins on page 233 and covers about 20 pages of this report. That is the information that, at my request and with the permission of the President, the Tariff Board furnished us; and if the gentleman will compare it with the other statistics that were obtained by this committee from the Census Bureau, the Bureau of Statistics, and from other departments of this Government, I think he will agree with me that we have not only brought an indictment against the Tariff Board, but that we have convicted them at the bar of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not suppose the gentleman, or any Member of the House, desires to convict the Tariff Board. What we want to do is to get at the exact information, if possible. Now, is it not true that the Tariff Board did not have complete information and did not have time to obtain that information, and therefore could not furnish the gentleman's committee with the complete information, and that the gentleman's committee knew that this state of facts existed, and therefore took all that the Tariff Board could offer them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We were glad to take all the Tariff Board offered, and I am sure that the Tariff Board did not have complete information. I am informed that they have been at work on this wool investigation for 18 months, attempting to gather data, and when we called on them a couple of months ago for the data that they could give to this Congress, it was furnished in this report. From the limited information it contains I am satisfied that if they went on for the next 10 years we would not get the information that is necessary to write a tariff bill, unless we should go to other sources, as we did.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I should like to know upon what basis the gentleman founds his statement that this Tariff Board has been working on the wool schedule—this particular schedule—for 18 months?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They stated in the papers that they were going to work on the wool schedule. It is more than 18 months since they finished consulting with the President in reference to putting into effect the maximum and minimum tariff. I supposed, when they stated they were going to work on the wool schedule, that they went to work on it. Now, I do not know that they did, but I assume that they did.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman realize that they only very recently completed a very detailed report on the print-paper and pulp schedule? Does not the gentleman know that, as a matter of fact, the question of Schedule K has only been taken up within not to exceed the last two or three months?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know it, because I know conclusively that it was more than a year ago when the appropriation was made to allow this Tariff Board to go to work on schedules of the tariff. That was 15 months ago, at least. It was stated in this House at that time that it was done to allow them to go to work on Schedule K. I do not know whether they ever did the work, or how soon they started, because I have not been in their confidence, but they have had 15 months to work and they announced that they were going to work.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not on this particular schedule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Some gentlemen announced it for them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Alabama stated that he voted for the tariff commission, wherein I think the gentleman exceeded in wisdom nine-tenths of his party. Suppose the gentleman and myself and others of us who sincerely favored at that time, and still do, as I hope the gentleman does favor, the creation of a permanent tariff commission; suppose we had been successful, and suppose the bill had not been defeated by the filibuster in the closing hours of the session, does the gentleman believe that we would have had accurate information to-day on the wool schedule from that tariff commission of which he was in favor?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say to the gentleman that I do not believe we would. I will tell the gentleman why. I have served on the Ways and Means Committee a good many years. One of the greatest troubles I have had confronting me at all times has been the lack of information. I have sought information. I believe that when we voted for that bill—which was not the present law, mark you, but was a bill to make the Tariff Board responsible to this House and not to the President—I believed then that if we could get a Tariff Board that would be responsible to this House we could gather information that would be of great value to the Ways and Means Committee and to the House. But after the demonstration the present Tariff Board has made I am candid enough to say that I think I made a mistake in voting for the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. If I understand the gentleman, he now announces that he is opposed to the creation of a permanent, responsible tariff commission?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am opposed to creating a tariff board or a tariff commission appointed or controlled by the President of the United States, because we have tried it, and it has proven an utter failure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I will say this, that if this House at some time—this House, mark you—should see proper to employ certain experts to gather statistical data for the information of the Ways and Means Committee and this House, and to make them a permanent part of this organization as you make that corps of reporters sitting there, I believe it would be a wise thing to do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Alabama now announces that he made a mistake in voting in favor of the Tariff Commission?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In view of the light I have at present, I think I did.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the gentleman now is opposed to the creation of a permanent tariff commission, to be appointed by the President but subject to the call of either House of Congress?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am satisfied from a consideration of the question that we could not make a tariff board appointed by the President subject to the call of this House, and I will tell you why. I do not question the sincerity or the honesty of your President. He told me that the Ways and Means Committee of this House should have such information as that Tariff Board possessed. Now, I do not question that he meant it and that he was sincere. I have printed as a part of this report the information we got, and I say that there is one of two things sure. The Tariff Commission refused to give the facts we called for with the permission of the President of the United States, or they have wasted a quarter of a million dollars. One of these two things is sure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman mean to say that merely because the Tariff Board has failed to submit an elaborate report on wool, when it was not contemplated that such a report should be made before next December, it should therefore be indicted?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not intend to wander from my subject, but I will say candidly to the gentleman, aside from all other questions, that I judge from the work I have seen of the Tariff Board that they are approaching an investigation of this subject from their viewpoint. The House approaches it from its viewpoint. Now, I understand that the Tariff Board is wandering in many countries, ascertaining how much it costs to shear a sheep. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] As a matter of fact, the gentleman knows that if we want to ascertain the facts upon which to write a tariff law, that all the information about raising sheep or growing sheep is concentrated in one proposition, and that is, What is the price of foreign wool? That tells the story.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Permit me to interrupt——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And we get that in the daily papers whenever we choose to buy a London paper.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me tell the gentleman right here that one of the functions the Tariff Board is now performing is to find out just what the gentleman wants to know, to wit, the prices of wool—not the cost of raising sheep in foreign countries. The chairman of the Tariff Board, as I understand it, is to-day in London attending the wool sales, where the world's supply of wool is sold. The gentleman will probably admit that heretofore we have had no information whatever as to those London wool sales. That one thing alone would be of great value to this House in determining what the proper tariff should be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the gentleman should make the statement that it is necessary for this Government to send one of the members of this Tariff Board to London, at a great expense, to ascertain the price at which wool is sold, when the London papers publish it every day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; but does the gentleman or anybody whom he knows see that wool when it is sold?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, but the prices——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does he know what that wool is? Does the gentleman himself know what that wool is?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know; but others do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does any member of the Ways and Means Committee as at present constituted know?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The wool experts know what that wool is, just as well as the cotton experts know what the cotton is.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What experts?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The experts of the United States.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has any of them testified before the Ways and Means Committee in the formation of this bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was not necessary. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that if he will examine this report he will find the prices of wool stated here for a number of years, as shown on the London markets and the other great markets of the world.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Unquestionably; but we have not seen the wool.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, of course, if the gentleman has to have wool instead of facts and figures to write a tariff bill, then he approaches the subject from a different standpoint from what I do.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAGE). Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a little earlier in his speech the gentleman made this statement:

> We disclaim any purpose whatever of writing this bill in the interest of the manufacturer of wool or the producer of wool.

Speaking of the work of the Tariff Board, I assume that a large portion of their investigation is for the purpose of determining the condition of the wool industry and of the woolen industry, and of the effect of tariffs on those industries. Now, if the gentleman's committee framed a bill without reference to its effect upon these industries, of what benefit or advantage or use to the committee would be all of the information that the Tariff Board might bring before them on that subject?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. None at all, except so far as it went to show where the competitive points were that would produce the most revenue. That is all.

Mr. MONDELL. In framing your bill it was not a question at all as to what the effect of your tariff would be on the wool industry or the woolen industry, but how much revenue it would produce.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We wrote this bill to raise the revenue that the Government required, and we endeavored to write it no higher than was necessary to raise that revenue.

Mr. MONDELL. And therefore any information which a Tariff Board might be able to secure and transmit to the gentleman's committee touching the effect of the bill or of any tariff on the industries would not be information that would be useful to the committee in its consideration of the matter?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would say that it might guide us to some extent in determining where the maximum revenue point was, but it would not, of course, be as material to us as it would to gentlemen on that side of the House, who write tariff bills for the purpose of protecting profits of favored industries in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the Tariff Board first took up the study of the pulp and paper industry and sent men into the mills and forests to ascertain the cost of production, and so forth, and that recently—not 18 months ago, but recently—the Tariff Board has sent experts, sometimes the same men who visited the pulp and paper mills, collecting information to show the cost of the production of wool in all parts of the country, so as to show the amount lost from shrinkage in reducing wool in the grease to scoured wool, the amount of wool necessary to use to produce a certain quantity or pound of cloth, and so forth. Now, if that information should be obtained, would it have been of any benefit to apply it in the making up of this bill, in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, it would have been if we had not had the information, but we had all that information already, obtained from other sources.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman prepared to tell the House how many pounds of wool in the grease it takes to make a pound of scoured wool or how many pounds of wool it takes to make a pound of cloth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am, as far as the Tariff Board is and can——

Mr. MANN. Yes——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the gentleman knows and everybody else in this House knows, and it is a historic fact, that raw wool shrinks all the way from 20 per cent to 80 per cent, and the amount of shrinkage depends on where the wool comes from and how it is raised.

Mr. MANN. Does anybody know what quantity of wool shrinks 20 per cent and what quantity 30 per cent and what quantity 80 per cent?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman give that information to the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It is in the report.

Mr. MANN. I have examined this report and I have examined elsewhere and I have not been able to get the information.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will examine it carefully, I think he will.

Mr. MANN. I will be glad to have the gentleman point it out.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me to answer, I will be glad to state the information I have, but the gentleman interrupts me with questions before I can give an answer.

Mr. MANN. I am trying to get my question fully before the gentleman so that I will not have to interrupt him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the English wools shrink to a slight degree. Some of the Australian wools are slight-shrinking wools. There are other European and Asiatic wools that shrink very materially. Some of the territory wool from the Territories of the United States—the Rocky Mountain territory—shrinks as much as 80 per cent; some of it very much less. Some of the Ohio wool only shrinks as much as 20 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Between the scoured stage?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. From the raw wool to the scoured.

Mr. LONGWORTH. From raw to scoured, only 20 per cent?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Some of it, I said, not all of it, but some of it. Now, the statistics show that these various grades of wool shrink all the way from 20 per cent to 80 per cent. You do not have to go to any Tariff Board to find that out. Any woolen manufacturer will give you that information, and the information is in this report. Of course this committee can not say that all wool shrinks alike, but what we have done is something that the Republican Party always refused to do—we have adopted an honest basis to allow for that shrinkage. We have put it at an ad valorem rate, and you have always insisted on putting it at so much a pound, so that the men who imported the cheaper wool that went into the clothes of the poorer people had to pay the higher price [applause on the Democratic side] and the higher grade of wool that the rich people bought which did not shrink so much did not pay relatively as great a price. This bill puts them all on the same basis and they pay their taxes in proportion to the value of the wool.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MONDELL. I know that the gentleman wants to be accurate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MONDELL. And for the sake of accuracy it is important that this statement in regard to shrinking should be correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I have made any misstatement, I would be glad to have the gentleman correct me.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not true that any of our wool shrinks as much as 80 per cent. You might take a poor, half-starved sheep that had got into a mudhole whose wool might shrink 80 per cent, but——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not mean to say that there is a great amount of wool that shrinks as much as 80 per cent. I gave that as the extreme. I know of no wool that shrinks more than 80 per cent, and I know of none that shrinks less than 20 per cent, and the range of shrinkage is between those two points.

Mr. MONDELL. The great bulk of our fine wool, as the gentleman knows, shrinks about 65 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; that is, all your western wools.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true of the Territorial and the fine merino wools.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is true of the western wools, but the wools of Ohio do not shrink as much as 65 per cent, and very few of the imported wools shrink 65 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to call his attention to his own report, wherein he states that the shrinkage in Ohio wool is 51 per cent. That is the average shrinkage, of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; the average. And I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that although his wool shrinks only 51 per cent, or, say, 50 per cent in round numbers, 2 pounds of raw wool are necessary to make 1 pound of cloth, according to his own statement with respect to the wool from his own State; and when the gentleman from Ohio participated in writing Schedule K of the Payne tariff bill he gave to the woolen manufacturers a protection of 4 pounds of wool instead of 2 pounds; he levied a tax on the American people of 11 cents a pound on 4 pounds of wool instead of 11 cents a pound on 2 pounds of wool, as compensation to the American manufacturer, and allowed the American manufacturer to put 22 cents a pound in his pocket, deceiving the American people to that extent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I now understand the gentleman to say that scoured wool is the equivalent of cloth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but scoured wool is what cloth is made out of, and there is comparatively little loss of weight between the scoured wool and the cloth.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How much loss is it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A very immaterial amount. I can not recall the exact figures at this moment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Between ordinary scoured wool and woolen cloth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The scoured wool is the clean wool that goes into the cloth.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has it been combed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman must remember that all that comes out of the combing is not lost. They may comb out the tops, but then the noils and the inferior parts of the wool remain for use.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question before he gets away from the point raised by himself in regard to the change from the present method of levying a specific duty to the ad valorem method. Has the gentleman given consideration to the discretion in the administrative officer that is involved in the adoption of an ad valorem duty?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have; and if the gentleman will pardon me, I will endeavor, if I can find the point in my notes, to show him——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman is going to dwell upon it later I will not ask him to supply it now. But it seems to me you are opening a wide latitude for corruption in the customhouses, if you please, by changing from specific to ad valorem rates.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have thought that possibly the gentlemen might think we were opening the door for corruption at the custom houses, and therefore I stated in this report that the change from specific duties to ad valorem duties would, to a large extent, remove the temptation for corruption, and I will call the gentleman's attention to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What page is that on?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This is on page 14 of the report:

When a duty is assessed on a commodity of a certain value much larger in proportion than when the value is a few cents less per pound or yard, the temptation is in many cases irresistible to have the lower value accepted for the sake of enjoying the much lower tax burden. For example, in Schedule K of the present act, yarns, valued at not more than 30 cents per pound, are taxed at 27½ cents per pound and, in addition, 35 per cent ad valorem, so that the total duty amounts to 38 cents per pound, or 126.6 per cent of the value. If the value of the yarn is declared at 31 cents per pound, the tax is 38.5 cents per pound and in addition, 40 per cent ad valorem, so that the total duty amounts to 50.6 cents per pound, or 163 per cent of the value. Hence a change in the valuation of 1 cent per pound reduces the burden of the duty by 37 per cent. The substitution, in the bill herewith reported, of straight ad valorem duties on articles of one kind or sort, instead of the present rates increasing as arbitrary dividing lines of value are crossed, will remove the extraordinary temptations to undervaluations which now prevail, and make the task of the customs service easier, as far as the scope of this bill goes.

Now, the difference between your bill and our bill in that instance is that if a man undervalued his wool 1 cent per pound, under your bill he could beat the Treasury out of a 37 per cent ad valorem tax. Under our bill there would be no great temptation to reduce that 1 cent, because the ad valorem rate would only change the tax to a very small degree; it would only be the tax of 1 cent a pound that he would gain by making a false affidavit.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Still, you are removing the specific obligation placed by law on the customs officer and leaving it to his discretion as to the value of the goods.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. The gentleman's argument is not sustained by his own law. Of course, that is true as to raw wool, but there is no commodity in the markets of the world of which the value is more easily obtained and better known than that of raw wool. But when you come to yarns, tops, or cloths you use a compound rate. You employ this specific rate that offers the temptation to falsify the records at the customhouse, and at the same time you use an ad valorem rate and put the burden of ascertaining the value on the customs officials. We use the ad valorem rate, and eliminate the specific rate, which you have in the Payne tariff law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is all determined by fixed weights and measures, as it were, and the customs officer has not the discretion that he would appear to have under your bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it is already determined how he would fix the ad valorem rate to-day, why is it not determined how he would fix the ad valorem rate to-morrow? He fixes it to-day and he can fix it to-morrow in the same way.

But the gentleman criticizes this bill because he thinks the ad valorem rates may permit frauds at the customhouse, which would be prevented if the rates were made specific. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that some of the most outrageous, most inexcusable, and greatest frauds ever perpetrated upon the Government of the United States at the customhouse were those committed by the American Sugar Refining Co. under the specific rate of duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was a fraud due to the connivance of men, which was punishable by law. There was no discretion given the customs officers to fix the value, as there is here a discretion to fix the value, and it seems to me you are leaving the door open when you depend upon the judgment of anyone, even that of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not the Payne bill leave it to the judgment of customs officers to fix rates of duty?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does in some respects.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does in every respect except as to raw wool and wastes. Can the gentleman name anything in Schedule K, except raw wool and wastes, where there is not an ad valorem rate on the goods?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is changing the system and advocating a brand-new policy, which says all the specific duties shall be removed and an ad valorem duty fixed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. We have simply stricken out the compensatory duty and lowered the ad valorem duty, but the ad valorem duty is there in the Payne law, and the customs officials have no more work to do and the Treasury will be in no more danger from frauds under the ad valorem rates in this bill than it is under the ad valorem rates in the Payne law.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman that in the McKinley Act, the Dingley Act, and the present law the committee labored to put everything as far as possible upon a specific rate and not an ad valorem, because of the universal testimony that came to the committees framing those bills that an ad valorem rate was a temptation to fraud, because a man swore to his judgment as to the value, and of course he could not be convicted of perjury in swearing to that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Notwithstanding the gentleman's statement, he left the main rates of taxation in his own act on an ad valorem basis.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no. If the gentleman from Alabama will ever study the law and read it through, he will find that he is wrong. The gentleman should not judge from newspaper reports of $18-a-week men. He ought to go to the first sources and study the question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me ask the gentleman from New York what is the rate on cloth over 70 cents a pound? Is it not four times the value of the raw wool, or 44 cents a pound, with 55 per cent ad valorem added?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; because we could not put a specific duty for every yard of cloth varying in price from $1 to $4 or $5 a yard. We could not put a specific rate as compensation for the wool duty on it without putting an ad valorem rate in order to catch the higher class of goods with a larger duty. Of course, without putting a larger duty on a higher class of goods they would say we were squeezing the poor people.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree to this fact: If you want to write a tariff bill in the interest of the American manufacturer, and enable him to tax the American people 100 or 125 or 180 per cent on goods that come through the customhouse, as you do under the Payne law, then a good way to do this and fool the people is to make these duties compound which include specific rates; that is the only justification for doing it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. When the gentleman talks about the rate per cent, he knows that it is misleading. Even take the whole wool schedule and it does not represent fairly the percentage that is charged on woolen goods. The general percentage is much less than the gentleman states. It is only where there is a small importation that a man can produce the manifest on the stump and from that say they are taxing woolen goods 180 per cent. Where the importations are very small they can justify that kind of buncombe.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know, and the gentleman from New York knows, that the average rate on woolen manufactures for 1910 was 90.10 per cent, and the people of the United States know, if the gentleman from New York does not know, that it is too great a tax for them to be compelled to pay in the interest of a great monopoly.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman refer to the whole woolen schedule?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I left out raw wool. I said manufactured wool. We recognize that the tax on raw wool is a highly competitive rate.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the gentleman from Alabama to say a moment ago that the high rates were put upon the heavy-shrinking wool and the low rates on the light-shrinking wool; that the high rates were on the wools used by the poor man and the low rates on the wools used by the rich man.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To a large extent.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman mean to say that the heavy-shrinking wool—the fine wools—are the wools ordinarily used in the cheaper clothing?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say I am informed that the cheaper wools, the heavy-shrinking wools, are used to a large extent with shoddy in the manufacture of the cheaper class of clothes.

Mr. MONDELL. The first-class wools are the highest-shrinking wools. The third class only shrink 15 to 30 per cent. The wool that shrinks the most heavily is the merino, the fine wool, and that goes into broadcloth and the better and finer class of cloth; though, of course, the noils may go into cheap cloth. Now, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; for a question, but I would really like to proceed.

Mr. MONDELL. I have read the most of the gentleman's report on this bill. I presume the gentleman approves of everything in his report?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MONDELL. I notice with interest and some pleasure a statement contained in the report, on page 5, in the paragraph ending with the words "Schedule K," which I highly commend.

I find these words, and I am delighted that there are some things in this report that I can approve of, and I wish it were all of the same character:

As is well known, the Republican tariff legislation of 1909 was an honest revision in the public interest.

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say that the gentleman has very cleverly pointed out a misprint in this report. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I thought I had pointed out the one great truth.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that that is the first authority for such a statement anybody has been able to find.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Absolutely; and I had overlooked that in correcting the proofs. I am sure that the gentleman from Wyoming will not accuse me of intentionally indorsing a Republican tariff bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I make no such charge.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will not trouble the gentleman again, and if he is proposing to discuss the question I want to put to him, I do not desire to have it answered at this time; but the gentleman made reference a moment ago to compensatory duties, and I would like to ask whether he intends to discuss or will now discuss the difference in the rate of wages paid in this country and abroad as one of the various elements that enter finally into the cost of the completed garment. The woolgrower here is obliged to produce at a higher rate than the producer abroad. The man who does the scouring abroad receives much less wages than scourers receive here, and the man who does the spinning and the working of the material over into yarns receives a higher wage here than abroad, as does the man who finally weaves the cloth. I want to ask the gentleman whether he has taken into account the matter of the wages in the various stages of preparation of the cloth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, we have data in this report, and I am glad to call it to the attention of the gentleman, which comes from a bureau of this Government, presided over by men appointed by a Republican administration. Right here I wish to say to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that I find that the printer or some one else has left out the word "not" in the statement the gentleman read, and that is the reason of the change in that sentence. I am glad that it is corrected in the RECORD. Now, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I will answer his statement. As to the cost of production, if the gentleman will refer to page 9 of this report he will find this statement:

When statistical data as to cost of production have been obtained by the diligent efforts of well-trained and disinterested governmental agents, the Republican Party has treated them with neglect and contempt, and has gone on framing tariff acts to please private interests at the public expense, without any consideration whatever of ascertained facts as to the differences in cost of production.

The gentleman is charging us with not going into the cost of production, and I am answering him:

The Republican Party declares that the differences in the cost of production in the United States and other countries are due to the higher labor cost in the United States, and that high protective tariff duties must be levied to equalize these differences and provide a reasonable profit for our manufacturers. In May, 1892, President Harrison submitted to Congress a comprehensive report by the Commissioner of Labor, Carroll D. Wright, on the cost of producing textiles and glass in the United States and in Europe. This report showed that for 70 establishments, of which 38 were located in the northern portion of the United States and the remainder in the southern, the total cost of producing cotton fabrics was $23,494,056, involving labor costs to the amount of $6,447,653, or 27.44 per cent of the total cost of production; for 5 establishments shown in this report, in Great Britain, the labor costs were 20.53 per cent of the total cost of production.

The cost of producing woolen fabrics in 30 establishments in the United States for the periods reported by the Commissioner of Labor amounted to $4,705,112, the labor cost being $982,981, or 20.89 per cent of the total cost of production. The labor cost in producing these fabrics in Great Britain, as brought out in the testimony before the British tariff commission and published in its report in 1905, ranges from 14 to 24 per cent of the total cost, according to the character of fabrics.

Now, there is the information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think that scarcely answers the question I asked. I wanted to direct the gentleman's attention to the difference in the cost of labor, the difference in wages paid here and abroad. This extract seems to differentiate between the manufacturer and the workingman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is a Republican authority for the gentleman—a report handed in to Congress by a Republican President, in which he says that the labor cost is very much less than half. Now, I will say to the gentleman candidly, after answering him out of the mouth of the Republican Party, that we had before us the testimony of Mr. Clark, of the Bureau of Commerce and Labor. He was sent abroad two years ago to search out the facts and report to Congress, and his report has been published in the tariff hearings and is as accessible to the gentleman as it was to us.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He found the wages were less in Europe?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He states that the difference in cost does not exceed one-half.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is to say, the difference is 50 per cent between wages paid there and wages paid here?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is an extreme statement as compared with this report of Mr. Wright, who only makes it 7 per cent difference; but assuming that to be so——

Mr. McCALL. If the gentleman will permit, that is 7 per cent of the total cost of the cloth; it is not simply 7 per cent of the labor cost.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; 7 per cent.

Mr. McCALL. That is, it is about 33 per cent more; 20 per cent in one case, total cost, and in the other case 27 per cent——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly not.

Mr. McCALL. Which would be about 33 per cent more labor cost.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. McCALL. That is very clear.

Mr. DALZELL. May I ask this question for information? Does the gentleman contend there is any protection in this bill at all, accidental or incidental, or is it a pure revenue measure?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is a pure revenue measure, and being such it could not help carrying some incidental protection, if it levied but one cent of taxes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the question I was trying to arrive at, whether consideration had been given to protect the laborer who is employed in these various industries in this country against the unfair lower 50 per cent wage abroad?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman, as I said to this House in the beginning, that we did not write this bill to protect anybody. This bill does carry an incidental protection that far exceeds the difference in the labor cost at home and abroad, and if the gentleman will listen to me I will tell him why. The average cost of production, as shown by the reports of the Bureau of Labor by people who have investigated the woolen manufactures of this country, amounts to about 23 per cent of the value of the product. Now, Mr. Clark, the agent of the Republican Ways and Means Committee of the last Congress, was requested to go abroad and report the difference in cost between this country and England and Germany. He reported that the difference was about one-half; therefore to protect that difference in cost between this country and England it would take one-half of 23 per cent, or about 11½ per cent, to protect the difference in the labor cost involved in the woolen industry on the average. Now, I am not prepared to go into every detail, but I am giving you the figures of the Census Bureau and of your own agent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will pardon me; I do not want him to misunderstand me. He makes the mistake which, I think, is very frequently made by Members on that side, and even by some on this side, of viewing this question solely from the standpoint of the manufacturers' interests. I am trying to draw the gentleman's attention to the man who works in the mill, whose wages are so different in this country from the lower wages paid abroad. This man I want to see protected in any measure that may be adopted by this House, whether advocated on that side or on this. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that, of course, we could not write a revenue tariff and produce the revenue that is necessary to run this Government without levying a rate higher in every instance than the difference in the labor cost here and abroad. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It would be impossible for us to do it. We could not do it, if we wanted to, and get the revenue, and we have not done it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But fundamentally, under the gentleman's theory of levying taxes for revenue only, the committee does not take into consideration the question of labor at all, does it, but simply takes into consideration the question of raising revenue?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, the gentleman is going into an academic argument.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No; I am taking the gentleman's own statement, made by himself at the opening of his speech.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman again that we wrote this bill solely for the purpose of raising revenue——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is what I said——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I will state, in this connection, that the rates of duty in this bill more than double the difference in labor cost between this country and abroad. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, and I will promise that this will be the last question I will ask him. It is a question in point. I think the gentleman's answer to this question will develop his theory in the making of this bill. I observe on page 11 of the report, in the last sentence of the first paragraph, this language:

> It can not be questioned but that the cost of woolgrowing in Ohio, one of our oldest, most thoroughly cultivated, and densely populated woolgrowing sections, must be approximately the maximum cost of woolgrowing in the United States, and hence that statistical data concerning such cost in Ohio ought to be among the most significant and valuable that could be supplied by the Tariff Board, whether for purposes of legislation or otherwise.

That was made in connection with the gentleman's criticism of the Tariff Board for not having given full information.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that they have that information, but they refuse to give it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not know whether that is true or not——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am so informed——

Mr. LONGWORTH. But let me ask this question of the gentleman: Suppose that the Tariff Board had given to the gentleman information which proved conclusively, in his judgment, that a duty of 20 per cent was not sufficient to equalize the difference between the cost of production of wool, we will say, in Australia and in Ohio. Would that one circumstance have influenced the gentleman in the amount of the duty placed upon raw wool?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Only so far as it influenced my mind in finding the point where we could levy the required revenue and how high it had to be in order to obtain the revenue that the Government needed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think I understand.

Mr. UTTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. UTTER. I understand the gentleman to say that the bill has been framed for the purpose of securing revenue?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. UTTER. Therefore, in fixing the ad valorem duty, I ask on what you have based the duty to come from, either from less imports or larger imports than at present?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Larger imports. If the gentleman will examine the report, that fact will appear very clearly.

Mr. UTTER. Larger imports mean less home manufactures.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not necessarily less home manufactures, because the country is growing.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Some people will wear two pairs of shoes instead of only one, for example.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer the gentleman and say that no man in this country is entitled to a monopoly. Does the gentleman agree with me?

Mr. UTTER. We all agree on that; oh, yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And no industry in this country is entitled to a monopoly. Does the gentleman agree on that?

Mr. UTTER. We all agree on that; yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That no combination of industries in this country is entitled to a monopoly, whereby it can put burdens on the American people?

Mr. UTTER. That is correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we all agree on that, I say that this combination of woolen industries has had a monopoly of the woolen business in this country for many years.

I want to call your attention to page 179 of this report, where you will find the table from which I have gathered the following facts: The domestic production of manufactured wool in this country the last census year (calendar year 1909) amounted to $514,732,000. The imports of manufactured wools for that year amounted to $18,102,000, making the imports and the production amount to $532,834,000. We exported $1,971,000, which, deducted from the production and the imports, left $530,863,000 worth of manufactured woolen goods that the American people consumed in the year.

Now, in this consumption of goods under Schedule K, valued at $530,863,000, there were only $18,102,000 worth of imports. The importations amounted to only 3.4 per cent of the American consumption of woolen goods. Was that a monopoly for the American manufacturer?

Mr. UTTER. A monopoly for the American people, but not, perhaps, a monopoly for the American manufacturer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not a monopoly for the American manufacturer! My friend, if you had a grocery business in your town, and by law had control of 96 per cent of the groceries sold in that town, while outside competition could only bring in 4 per cent to compete with you, would you have a monopoly?

Mr. UTTER. If we had 100 groceries in that town we would not have a monopoly for any individual grocer, but we would have the protection of our home market for the home man.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But you would have a monopoly for the industry; and, more than that, there is nobody in this country who does not know that the American Woolen Co. to-day fixes the price of woolen goods; that it is a monopoly; that it is a trust; and that this industry and that company dictated to a Republican House, prohibiting you from reducing the exorbitant rates under Schedule K in the last Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman has given the percentage of imports of woolen manufactures at 3.4 per cent last year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Can the gentleman give the percentage of raw-wool imports for the same year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is stated in the report. I will say roughly that it is not quite 50 per cent.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That would be virtually on a competitive basis, for raw wool, under the present tariff rates.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not deny that the raw wool coming into this country was on an exceedingly competitive basis. The reason for not maintaining the high tax the Republican Party had put on raw wool was that if raw wool was taxed, as a matter of justice, not as a matter of protection, there must be a tax on the finished product as a compensation, whether it was done directly or indirectly; and if we maintained that high tax, amounting to about 45 per cent, it made the burden on the American people too great. There was no question about it being a revenue measure at a competitive rate; but we lowered the rate for the purpose of lowering the burden resting on the American people who were compelled to buy woolen goods. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It is also a fact, is it not, that it is at a rate that will produce a greater amount of revenue than the rate in the proposed bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unquestionably. The Payne rate produced $21,000,000, and this rate will produce $13,000,000 on raw wool. We reduced the rate, not because it was not a high-revenue rate, but because the tax on raw wool forced us, as a matter of justice, to carry the tax into the ad valorem rate put on the finished product, and so placed too great a burden on the American people.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the ideal revenue rate upon a competitive article, such as raw wool is admitted to be, is not the rate which will produce the greatest amount of revenue?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman mean the 20 per cent rate?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No. Would not the ideal revenue rate upon a competitive article be the rate that would produce the maximum of revenue?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not agree with the gentleman about that. I think we should raise the maximum amount of revenue with a minimum amount of burden on the American people; and consequently we should, under no circumstances, put the rate higher than that which will raise the maximum amount of revenue necessary for the Government.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is it not true that the increased importations of raw wool which are contemplated under the proposed law and the increased importations of manufactured wool will both fall on the raw-wool producer?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not question that this bill is going to bring more competition to the American manufacturer; necessarily so. If we are right, it will bring more competition in raw wool; but I think the lower rates of duty will enable the people of the United States to wear less shoddy, less mixed goods, and more wool, and in the end will probably be more to the benefit than to the detriment of the woolgrower.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to make one closing suggestion. It seems to me that the debate on the wool tariff revolves altogether around the raw wool. It is conceded that this proposed law will not be of benefit at least to the raw-wool producer. I do not think anybody will make any claim during the entire course of the debate that the producer of raw wool will receive any benefit, directly or indirectly, in dollars and cents. I think, therefore, the debate should turn somewhat upon the benefits of reductions in manufactures.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that it is true that the men who raise sheep in this country will have the direct protection of 45 per cent under the Payne law reduced incidentally under this bill to 20 per cent, and to that extent, if you are looking at it from a protectionist standpoint, there is that much less protection. On the other hand, the gentleman must not forget that this bill reduces the cost of goods under the Payne law from an average of 90 per cent to an average of 42½ per cent, and when the man who is raising sheep gets that much less protection, incidentally or otherwise, on his wool he benefits by a much greater difference in the reduction on clothes, and his neighbors who do not raise sheep get the full benefit of the reduction.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I want to see if I understand the gentleman. Raw wool under the Payne law is on a competitive basis with foreign wool that we import?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is so.

Mr. CANNON. Woolen goods are not, according to your statement, under the Payne law upon a competitive basis, but upon a monopolistic basis?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Upon a prohibitive basis.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman why he does not let the Payne law rates rest upon raw wool, which is competitive, and cut in two, or down to the proper basis, the finished products which the gentleman says are monopolistic?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, as I said to the House, I am not, nor never have been, a protectionist, and do not believe in the system. I do not believe that the iron furnaces in which I own stock are entitled to make profits by reason of the sanction of the United States Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I would not stand for it. But I do believe in justice.

I say that if the raw material that the manufacturer must use is taxed, and his competitor gets his raw material free, it is not protection, but justice, to put such a tax on the competitor's finished product as will equalize the tax placed on the home manufacturer's raw material. Therefore, when the tax is put on the raw wool as a mere matter of justice to the American manufacturer, you are compelled to lay that much tax, at least, on the foreign competitor who gets his wool free. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois will differ with me in that.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, if I held the same views as the gentleman does, that the manufacturer's tax on imports from abroad is monopolistic, and the wool producer's tax on foreign wool was competitive, I would reduce the monopolistic tax to where it would be competitive without letting the competitive tax on raw wool be disturbed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have great respect for the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. As to the procedure of this House there is probably not a wiser man in it and no better informed man in reference to the great appropriations of the Government, but his statement clearly indicates that since he has been a Member of this House he has never served as a member of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, I do not pretend to be an expert touching the details of the schedules, and never have. I concede the gentleman is one of the best experts, in my judgment, in either House or Senate, because his attention has been along that line of legislation, while mine has been along the line of appropriation; but any man, it seems to me, a nonexpert, must say that if the one product, raw wool, is competitive with the raw wool of the world under the Payne law, and the manufactured product is monopolistic on account of the high duties on imports, then he would let the woolgrower alone, who is honestly competing, and would cut down the monopolistic tax on foreign manufactured products and get more revenue and more justice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will show the gentleman where he is wrong.

Mr. CANNON. It may be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The tax on raw wool now is 45 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CANNON. But competitive.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, it is competitive, since one-half of it comes into the country because we can not produce as much wool as we consume. Now, suppose we cut the tax on the manufactured product half in two and bring it down to an average of 45 per cent instead of 90 per cent, it would be brought down to the level of the raw wool, and where would be the protection that the gentlemen on that side of the House claim for the labor of this country if he carried out his plan? I am not working it out on that basis, but that is the gentleman's plan.

Mr. CANNON. Not at all. I was taking the gentleman's statement without admitting the correctness of his statement in any respect; but I want to say to the gentleman that labor in the United States in these great industries is not greatly benefited, from the gentleman's standpoint or from mine, if, under taxation that gives a monopoly to the manufacturer, the manufacturer organizes trusts and, as the gentleman claimed, without letting labor share in the profit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not say that labor does not get something out of it, but when the Government of the United States gives to this great protected monopoly a 90 per cent protection, when their entire labor cost amounts to only 23 per cent, and the difference in cost at home and abroad is less than 12 per cent, with a 90 per cent protection, it seems to me that an enormous amount of profits are protected.

Mr. CANNON. If that statement is correct, the gentleman's bill is too high in the rate fixed on imports of manufactures of wool.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will say that the gentleman's criticism is correct, if we were levying this bill from the standpoint of protecting merely the labor cost. We did not write this bill from the standpoint of protection. He is clearly correct, however, if that were the case. The rates in the bill were adjusted to meet the revenue requirements of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman does that, will he yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want first to answer the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. I will say to the House that we did not guess at these revenue rates. We employed an expert for the Ways and Means Committee, a gentleman who had been engaged in work of this kind when the Wilson bill was written and who has been engaged in such work for many years. We asked him to figure out the lowest rate at which the maximum revenue could be obtained. Not satisfied with that, we called on the Treasury Department and asked them to detail to the Ways and Means Committee a statistician to make like calculations. The year 1896 was taken as the fairest year under the Wilson law, because the previous years were affected by the panic of 1892, and the subsequent year, 1897, showed larger importations, presumably due to the expectation that a law would go into effect raising tariff rates, and goods were rushed into this country to avoid paying those higher duties. So, taking the year 1896 as the fairest year under the Wilson law, these experts took a series of years under the McKinley law and compared them with the year 1896 under the Wilson law, and then they reversed the proposition and compared the year 1896 of the Wilson law with a series of years under the Dingley law, considering the importation of raw wool in the Wilson bill as 100 and the importation under the McKinley law as zero, and from that prepared tables showing the increase in the amount of importations following reductions in rates.

Now, that is an estimate; it is not a fact, but it is as close an estimate as men can make. The estimates which were made under this bill by these statisticians show that if we levied a revenue rate of 40 per cent on cloth and 45 per cent on clothes and adjusted the duties down the line proportionately to the rate on the raw material, omitting the revenue from raw wool, but retaining the rates adjusted for the manufactured products on the basis of the duty on raw wool, we would raise $27,000,000 and be $13,000,000 short of the amount of revenue required from Schedule K. Now, the only way we had to make up the needed revenue was by placing a duty on raw wool. We could not lower the rates throughout the remainder of the schedule and get more revenue, because we had passed below the rate where the greatest amount of revenue could be raised. If we had made the rates on the manufactures of wool 10 per cent lower than as adjusted in the bill—that is, reduced from the average of 42 to 32 per cent—we would have only raised, according to our figures, about $20,000,000. Therefore we could not reduce the rates more without abandoning the Treasury. So instead of reducing the rate below 40 and 45 per cent in this bill, which cut the Payne bill in two, we levied a tax of 20 per cent on raw wool, taxed the manufacturer to the extent of 20 per cent, which these statisticians say will bring $13,000,000 in revenue, making the schedule produce $40,500,000 during a twelve-month period compared with $41,000,000 produced during the fiscal year 1910 under the Payne law, but more revenue than Schedule K will yield this year; at the same time we have made a competitive rate, not of 42 per cent on the average, but equivalent to 32 per cent on the average, because we have tied the hands of the American manufacturer to the extent of the 20 per cent tax we levy on raw wool. Now, it is fair to say that when you transfer the raw wool into the finished product it does not mean you have got to add 20 per cent compensatory duty on the finished product. As far as I can estimate it, if we divide the tax on raw wool by 2 and add the result to the tax on the finished product you provide a fair compensatory duty. As will be readily seen, the 4 pounds of wool in a pound of the cloth in my suit of clothes, or 3½—but say 4 pounds to make the computation easy—if the raw wool cost 25 cents a pound and it would be taxed——

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not let it go in the RECORD that he is wearing a suit that only cost 25 cents a pound.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am speaking of the raw wool in it. Suppose the wool in a pound of the cloth in this suit cost $1—I do not know what the wholesale importing price is—but I suppose it is somewhere in the neighborhood of $1.75 to $2 per pound or per yard. Suppose the cloth costs $2 a yard and coming in as cloth should pay only 20 per cent ad valorem. The tax this pound or yard would pay, at the wholesale importing price of $2, would be 40 cents. In this yard, the wool, which has cost $1, paid 20 cents in tax. It is evident that an ad valorem rate on the finished cloth of half the rate on the raw wool—that is, 10 per cent—would make the tax on the cloth 20 cents, or just the amount of the tax on the wool. The cloth in the suit would pay, at 20 per cent ad valorem, a total tax of $1.60. In the making of the suit the 16 pounds of wool used paid, at 20 per cent ad valorem, a total tax of 80 cents. Hence, if the cloth in the suit bore a 10 per cent tax on its value this tax would equalize the amount of the tax paid on the wool used in making the cloth. It will be seen that you do not carry the full 20 per cent tax as a compensatory duty against the finished product. Now, I will say a great many manufacturers claim that you ought to carry 65 per cent of the tax you levy on raw wool into the ad valorem rate on the finished product as a compensation for the tax they pay, but after carefully estimating and working it out as far as the committee and the experts could, I think by carrying 50 per cent of the tax on raw wool into the ad valorem rate on the finished product you fully compensate the manufacturer.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me that the gentleman makes an error that leads to an injustice to the woolgrower by calling that raw material when there is no raw material.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not call it raw material; I called it raw wool. I suppose it is the manufactured raw material.

Mr. CANNON. As raw material it sinks away now, being on a competitive basis, on the ground that this is substantially raw material. Yet it is the finished product of the woolgrower. Now, the gentleman goes to the finished product of the manufacturer, imported, and claims that under present law it gives the American manufacturer a monopoly, and then reduces the duty on raw wool imported one-half, when under the Payne law it is now upon a competitive basis, and it seems to me it is a little bit like free hides in one sense, where the manufacturers of shoes were very anxious for free hides and got them, and thereby we lost $3,000,000 of revenue annually without getting any reduction in the price of shoes or leather.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I realize that; and we have been more diligent in our pursuit of the interests of the Treasury, in taking care of the Treasury, than the gentleman's side was with respect to the Payne law. But I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I have no dispute with him about raw material. I know of no raw material except the sunshine, air, and water. The wool I called not "raw material," but "raw wool," because I knew of no better name than "raw wool" by which to describe it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MANN. I could not, or at least did not, quite follow the gentleman while he was giving his explanation of why he does not figure the entire amount of duty paid on the wool in considering the amount of tariff upon the finished product or cloth. Take cloth. On the average the importation value of cloth is about $1 a pound. If, for the purpose of argument, we assume 4 pounds of wool to a pound of cloth, the duty on the wool therein would be 17 cents, on the basis of last year's importation of class 1 wool. Now, why does not the manufacturer have to pay, on the gentleman's assumption, 17 cents a pound more for that wool than if it were free? And, if so, why should he not have that compensation in figuring that amount of tariff on the cloth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I have not the figures at hand, but I have examined them carefully in my office. I can not stop now to make them over again, but I will, with the gentleman's permission, put the accurate figures in my remarks when they are printed. But I would say to the gentleman that he can readily see that the wool in the suit of clothes I am wearing, coming into this country as raw wool, is of less value than as manufactured wool in this suit. Therefore an ad valorem rate levied on it as manufactured wool produces a greater amount of revenue in one instance and more of a result to the manufacturer in the other than if it should come in as raw wool. In other words, assuming for the sake of this argument—and I will put in the correct figures—that the value of the wool in this suit, unmanufactured, as the American manufacturer buys it, is worth $1 at the customhouse, why, then, 20 per cent on that would be 20 cents; and assuming that the manufactured wool in this suit when it comes in is worth $2—and it certainly is in that proportion, if not more—if we should levy a tax of 20 per cent, that would really give a protection of 40 per cent—not merely a compensation. All he is entitled to is a compensation of 20 per cent.

From the best figures that I can get, I think if you divide by two the tax you put on raw wool, or take 50 per cent of the tax and carry that into the ad valorem rate on manufactured goods, you have given the just compensation for taxing the manufacturer.

Now, I am free to say that many of the manufacturers do not agree with me about this. Many of them admit that the entire tax on the raw wool ought not to go in, and I do not know of any manufacturers who claim that more than 65 per cent of the tax ought to go in the rate on the finished goods. In other words, some of them claim that if you tax raw wool 20 per cent the compensatory equivalent that should go into that tax on the finished product should be as much as 13 per cent. I figure that when you tax raw wool 20 per cent, 10 per cent is a fair equivalent to go into the tax levied on the finished fabric. Now, this does not work out in every case. If you take a very light suit of clothes, with a very small amount of wool in it and a very high cost of labor, of course there is very little wool, and probably 5 per cent would be a necessary equivalent for the fabric; but if you take a very heavy suit of clothes with a great deal of wool in it and less labor, then the 50 per cent equivalent, making it 10 per cent ad valorem, may be under the mark.

Mr. MANN. But does it not work out in every case that the American manufacturer who pays the duty or buys American wool pays that much more for the wool, equaling 20 per cent, or equivalent to about 5 cents a pound?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You mean he pays that much more for the wool than the foreign manufacturer does?

Mr. MANN. Yes; more than the foreign manufacturer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unquestionably. There is no dispute about that. Therefore I say in this report that it figures out that the rates amount to 42.55 per cent; but I state in my report that the competitive point is not 42.55 per cent, but it is really competitive at 32.55 per cent. But the incidental protection that the American manufacturer gets out of this bill only amounts to 32.55 per cent instead of 42.55 per cent. And I am free to say to the gentleman that I think this is the most competitive bill that has ever been brought before the House of Representatives since the Walker bill of 1846.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the gentleman, in fixing the amount of the ad valorem upon the finished product, on the cloth, clothing, and so forth, in order to do justice there was some consideration given to the fact that there was an ad valorem tax upon the wool.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course. We are not protectionists, but that is a mere matter of justice.

Mr. MANN. I am not arguing that question. That is only a preliminary proposition. Is the gentleman able to say what the amount of wool is in the different products that are carried by this bill, such as dress goods, clothing, and things of that sort, having taken into consideration the amount of the tariff on the wool itself?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We estimated that very carefully in the committee. I estimated it myself. I have not the figures in my head as to the difference.

Mr. MANN. Are they in the report?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Only in a general way.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman expect, before he concludes his remarks, to discuss the paragraphs in the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To some extent. I will say to the gentleman that I can not carry in my mind the actual estimates on each paragraph, because, aside from that, you take cloths, which vary in weight to a very great extent. We estimated in reference to a number of different weights, but these would be of no especial value here. I have it, though, in this report.

Mr. MANN. It may not be of value, and still it is interesting if the gentleman has it. Take women's and children's dress goods, not composed entirely of wool, or in the main, as I understand, but composed of cotton, on which there is no tariff. Has the gentleman's committee made an estimate of the amount of wool in the quantity of those goods that are expected to be imported?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course we could not go into that detail, and neither could anybody else. In order to be taxed as wool, the chief component part must be of wool.

Mr. MANN. That is not the case as I understand it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it is to be taxed as wool, that is the case. Of course it varies as to clothing. But I will say to the gentleman that writing a bill for the purpose of protecting some one is one thing and writing a bill to supply the Government revenue at the least rate possible and to get the money is another thing.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this language in the bill "on women and children's dress goods composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 45 per cent ad valorem," that the customs office ascertains under that which has the most value, cotton or wool?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will look at the law, he will see that this is what governs.

Mr. MANN. This is another proposition entirely. Here is an act that stands by itself and says "composed wholly or in part of wool shall be 45 per cent," and so forth. I will not ask the gentleman to delay now——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As the Secretary of the Treasury states, the courts have repeatedly held that "cloths made wholly or in part of wool" covers only such cloths in which the wool is the element of chief value, the latest decision upon this subject being that of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in United States v. Johnson (157 Fed. Rep., 754; T. D., 28516).

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. I want to say that it seems to me that if you levy a duty of 20 per cent on raw wool and then levy a duty of 20 per cent on the finished product it would totally compensate the manufacturer for the duty he paid on the raw wool and in addition give him the same degree of protection for the other elements composing the finished product. That is, both he and the wool grower would be protected equally.

Mr UNDERWOOD. It would not go to that extent. If my figures are correct, if you levy 20 per cent on raw wool and then 20 per cent on the finished product, you compensate the manufacturer to the extent of 10 per cent, and he would get an incidental protection of 10 per cent.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman does not understand my statement. When you levy a duty of 20 per cent on the finished product—that is, on the total value of the finished product including the raw wool and the labor required to convert the wool into cloth—does not that fully compensate him for the duty paid by him on the raw wool and give him an equal protection besides?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It gives more than compensation; it gives the manufacturer an incidental protection. It undoubtedly gives full compensation and more than full compensation.

Mr. HARDY. All you put above that rate for purposes of revenue is protection incidentally.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course.

Mr. HARDY. The same rate on the raw wool and the finished product would be full compensation and more; it would be incidental protection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman means that the manufacturer is more than compensated by the tax of 20 per cent on the finished product, for the 20 per cent on raw wool. The gentleman is undoubtedly right. He is more than compensated, because, according to my estimate, if you do not want to protect him, incidentally or otherwise, merely want to give him a compensatory duty, if you levied a 20 per cent duty on raw wool you should levy a 10 per cent duty on the finished product. In my judgment he would be compensated for the tax you levied on the raw wool by reason of the increased value of the finished product.

Mr. HARDY. I agree with the gentleman from Alabama, and I think he agrees with me. I say by the same percentage he would be not only compensated, but given a degree of protection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. He would not be given the same amount of protection, because under that the raw-wool producer would be given 20 per cent incidental protection and the manufacturer 10 per cent protection.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the House for the time I have consumed, but Members have desired to ask me questions, and I have been compelled to answer them. I will bring my remarks to a conclusion in a very few moments.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Looking at this matter from the woolgrowers' standpoint, the gentleman from Alabama has been very thorough as to what was incidental protection to the manufacturer, and also he informed the House quite clearly that the Ways and Means Committee by this bill has put the manufacturer on a competitive basis. I want to say to the gentleman that we woolgrowers do not come in at all, because there is no incidental protection whatever, and we have been knocked out of competition; but that is not the question. The gentleman has said that this was intended for the purpose of raising revenue. My question is, Why is it necessary to reduce the rate on raw wool when we already have a surplus of imported wool into this country to an amount equal to one-eighth of all that was imported in the last year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that in the opinion of the committee, if we had left the tax on raw wool as it was and then put sufficient tax on the finished product to make the $40,000,000 we were trying to raise, and at the same time compensate the manufacturer for the tax of 45 per cent that he had to pay on this raw wool, we would have had to put our rates much higher than we have them now and put the burden on the backs of the American people much greater than it is in this bill. Therefore, we declined to write a bill in that way, and we wrote the bill in a way—and the only way—in which in our judgment it could be written and obtain $40,000,000 from Schedule K and at the same time put the least burden upon the backs of the American people.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, that is just the point. Now, one word more. How is the American consumer of goods going to be benefited by a reduction in this rate inasmuch as we already have, as I say, a surplus up to yesterday in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston of 33,000,000 pounds, equal to one-eighth of the production for the last year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman means of wool?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; and I want to know what the relation is between the reduction of the duty and the consumer's price that he will have to pay for the goods?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As the gentleman understands, if this bill becomes a law we hope it will be such a satisfactory law—it will not be for to-morrow only, but for a number of years to come, and the immediate market for raw and manufactured wool to-day is not the point we are considering.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that there is no expectation on the part of the gentleman to reduce the tariff on raw wool for a number of years if the gentleman's party is in control?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not say that, and I am not predicting.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman says that he hopes the bill would be so satisfactory that it would not be changed for years to come.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MANN. Which would mean of course that the gentleman would hope there would be no reduction in the tariff on raw wool?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am in hopes that this bill will prove a great satisfaction to the American people after the burdens they have struggled under for the last 25 years.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman say "25 years"? Why does the gentleman take such special delight in including that time when they did struggle under burdens while the Wilson bill was in effect?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They were not burdens under the wool schedule.

Mr. LONGWORTH rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will please not interrupt me any more. I have tried to answer everybody, and really I am becoming worn out.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This is a question which seems to me in point, but if the gentleman does not desire to be interrupted——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask my friend not to, because if I yield to one gentleman I must to another, and I would like now to conclude my remarks, because I am myself becoming tired making my own argument.

Mr. Chairman, I only want to say in conclusion that we have written this bill primarily to reduce the burdens resting on the American people. On cloths that the American people have to buy we have reduced the tax under this bill from 97 per cent to 40 per cent. What does that mean? It means that the man who brings into this country 10 yards of cloth for his family under the Payne tariff law—if the cloth is worth $1 a yard—would have to pay $9.70 tax. If this bill is enacted into law, and he brings in that cloth under similar circumstances, he will pay $4 in tax. There will be a saving to him when he imports the 10 yards of cloth of $5.70, and not only that, but the competition coming from abroad will reduce the price charged by the American manufacturer. I have estimated that the tax imposed on the people who buy cloth in this country, the tax paid to the American manufacturer, amounts to over $100,000,000 a year, while the tax collected under the Payne law at the customhouses amounts to only a little over $15,000,000 a year. That is where the burden rests on the American people.

On blankets we have reduced the tax from 95½ per cent to 30 per cent ad valorem.

If a man brings into this country or buys from a protected manufacturer a blanket for $2, under the present law his tax would be $1.90. If this bill becomes a law, his tax will be 60 cents. On the $2 blanket we will have reduced the tax from $1.90 to 60 cents, a saving to the American consumer of $1.30 on a $2 blanket. On women's dress goods the average rate under the Payne law is 102 per cent. We reduce it to 45 per cent. On $10 worth of women's dress goods imported into this country to-day the man or woman who brings them in would have to pay a tax of $10.20. If this bill becomes a law, he or she would have to pay a tax of $4.50.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to finish——

Mr. MANN. Well, I know, but the gentleman is in charge of a great bill, and ought to be willing to give information, and I am sure he is willing to do so, and the House will be patient with him. I notice that the proposed tariff on men's clothes is 40 per cent. That is mainly wool. The tariff on women's and children's goods is 45 per cent, largely cotton. Why is the discrimination made now against the women's and children's goods in the rate of duty?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not at all agree with the gentleman in his premise. He assumes that the women's goods that are imported are largely cotton. When they are largely cotton they will be taxed as cotton, and I will say to the gentleman that the goods imported are not largely cotton, that the cotton goods that the American people have to buy are of American manufacture. It is not foreign goods that come in here under these rates of duty that are made up of cotton and shoddy, but it is American manufactured goods that are sold behind this prohibitive protective tariff wall that have cotton and shoddy in them.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that women's and children's goods are largely cotton warp and woolen filling?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Some of them are, but I am talking about the ones that come in——

Mr. MANN. I am talking about the class of goods imported——

Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). Under this provision of the bill, but the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. MANN. Assuming, then, they are the same, why is there a discrimination of 5 per cent against women's and children's goods in favor of men's goods?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I recollect the figures aright, we found that by adding that 5 per cent to the particular class of goods it meant an increase in revenue of about a million and a quarter dollars—I can not be accurate, but that is my recollection—and it was put on there to get that million and a quarter dollars, because we were striving to bring the revenue features of this bill up to $40,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Could not it easily have been raised by taxing wool? Instead of taxing women's and children's goods, why not tax the men's goods?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, it was a question where the tax would produce the greatest result, and as the man pays for the goods in the end I do not think it is very material whether, in the first instance, he paid for it or the woman. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. It would be a very great comfort to a great many women in the country to know that the man pays for the goods. It is about an even chance that the women pay for the goods.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. They would have to pay much less on women's goods under this bill than under the Payne law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was coming to that, and I want the gentleman to take home to his constituents the fact that under this bill the women of Chicago, when they buy $10 worth of goods and bring them into this country or pay to the protected manufacturer, they have to pay under the Payne law $10.20 in taxes to the American manufacturer or at the customhouse, whereas under this bill they will pay only $4.50 in taxes.

Mr. MANN. That is a subject of great controversy between the two parties. That represents a principle. But what principle is involved in taxing the women's and children's goods 5 per cent more than the men's goods? What principle is involved in that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have already told the gentleman that no principle was involved in it. I will add also that, under the Payne Act, on the imports of 1910, the actual duties levied on women's goods were 5 per cent higher than those on the men's goods—102 per cent on the women's goods, compared to 97 per cent on the men's goods. We worked this out from a statistical standpoint.

As I said, we found we could raise this additional million and a quarter of revenue, according to our estimates, and we put it on for that reason—because we needed the revenue.

Now, I want to say in conclusion, thanking the House for its attention, that we have reported to this House a schedule that the experts, both of the Ways and Means Committee and of the Treasury Department, say will produce as much revenue as is produced by the corresponding schedule of the Payne law; that we have reduced the burden of taxation resting upon the American people on manufactured woolen goods from an average of 90 per cent to an average of 42½ per cent. Under this bill the incidental protection is far in excess of any difference in labor cost at home and abroad. We have reduced the rates in this bill from the prohibitive rates of the Payne law to a real competitive basis, where there will be at least some honest competition in favor of the American consumer. We have written this bill in compliance with the faith of our party. We have not violated the promises made to the country, as the Republican Party did two years ago [applause on the Democratic side], but we have kept faith with the American people, and we propose to go on in this tariff revision, keeping faith until we have revised each one of these schedules to an honest, competitive basis. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

The statement, prepared by Mr. HILL and ordered printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 5, 1911.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I am compelled to be away during the progress of the debate, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to print in the RECORD a criticism on the Underwood Schedule K as prepared by me and printed in the New York Journal of Commerce of Saturday last, and with it letters from three manufacturers of woolens in Connecticut. These men are not only independent of any trust or combination, but are considered to be the producers of as fine products as any other mills in the country, and all three of them are literally great "captains of industry" and know whereof they speak.

Very truly, yours,

E. J. HILL.

I also submit the Saturday market report from the Daily Trade Record, a purely nonpolitical trade paper.

DEMOCRATS' WOOL BILL SHARPLY CRITICIZED—CONGRESSMAN HILL SAYS IT IS POLITICAL MEASURE—IF ENACTED HIS OPINION IS THE WOOL AND WOOLEN INDUSTRY IN THE UNITED STATES WILL BE WIPED OUT—SAYS THE FABRIC RATES MUST BE INCREASED TO AT LEAST EQUAL COST OF MANUFACTURE.

WASHINGTON, June 2, 1911.

Congressman HILL, of Connecticut, to-day, after a thorough examination of the Democrats' wool and woolen bill, expressed great dissatisfaction with it. He is a Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee and a most competent critic of the bill, and a fair one, too, being in favor of a revision of Schedule K, but he says the bill, if enacted, would mean the annihilation of the wool and woolen industry of the United States. In an interview given out by him, and it is the first Republican criticism, he says:

"The title of the bill is 'A bill to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.' So far as the effect on this country is concerned, it might be 'a bill to reduce wool and manufactures of wool,' for that will unquestionably be the effect of it. The Wilson bill was the last expression of Democratic ideas on the wool tariff. It's effect on the whole was disastrous to the industry at that time, although undoubtedly there were some cases where, in the three and a half years of its existence, some establishments prospered in making specialties with the advantages which free wool gave, but taking it as a whole I think the practically unanimous opinion of both the woolgrower and the woolen manufacturer was that it was not then possible to successfully carry on the business of either growing or manufacturing wool in this country at the rates prescribed by the Wilson bill. Undoubtedly the improvement in manufacturing facilities and the reduction in interest rates in the last 16 years would be somewhat helpful in the prosecution of either branch of the business at the same rates now; but I think it is a fair assumption that when those rates have been named, or their equivalent, it is the last word possible with reference to the woolen industry, and that any reduction below those rates means the carrying on of the business in the future in a poor and dying condition, with a reasonable certainty of its speedy elimination from among the great industries of this country.

"The pending measure is undoubtedly a political proposition not intended to be put in operation as it is, but presented in the expectation that the duties on fabrics will be increased in the Senate and that the duties on wool will remain as the bill prescribes, thus throwing the burden of prescribing such rates as will maintain the industry in this country upon the Republican Party.

"As the bill is drawn, with the fabric rates below the difference in the cost of production, its effect upon the woolgrower will be worse than free wool, for, of course, no man will either buy domestic wool or import wool in the grease as a material for manufacturing if he knows in advance that he must sell the finished product at less than cost. As a result, whatever importations there are will be of fabrics, and the market for the domestic woolgrowers' product will therefore be taken away from him, except at the London price, less the cost of transportation both ways. With free wool and the difference of the cost of production of the fabric provided for by an equivalent rate of duty the market for domestic wool would be preserved, with the added advantage of the transportation on the foreign wool to the United States in favor of the American producer.

"I said that the Wilson bill rates were the last word possible to the preservation of the woolen industry in this country. The duty of 20 per cent on wool in the grease means an equivalent duty of 12 or 13 per cent on the fabric. This alone would make the bill impossible if the fabric rates were the same as the Wilson bill, but they are not. Even Mr. UNDERWOOD concedes that they are 5.29 per cent lower, taking the whole schedule, carpets and all, than the Wilson bill; but taking cassimeres and worsteds and dress goods for men and women, they are 10 per cent less, and in some cases lower still, which, added to the compensatory duty on the fabric because of the duty on the wool, would make, as closely as it can be figured, the general rates of this bill 25 per cent less than the Wilson bill.

"I would be very glad to have any woolen manufacturer, in any branch of the industry, write to me and give me as briefly and succinctly as he can his experience under the rates of the Wilson bill, and do it as promptly as possible, for I am convinced that the maintenance of the industry in the United States under this proposition is impossible with an experience 25 per cent worse than that which they had during the three and a half years of the operation of the Wilson law.

"But there is another feature to this matter, and that is the question of revenue. Theoretically the bill is brought forward as a revenue measure, and even with the estimates made by the committee and published as a part of the bill the schedule will show a diminution of revenue from last year of $1,500,000.

"In making these estimates the committee has assumed that for the next year there will be an increase in the value of importations of wool in the grease of between $19,000,000 and $20,000,000 and an increase in fabrics of between $40,000,000 and $41,000,000 in value. That value of wool in the grease represents 96,500,000 pounds, and the wool in the increased fabric importations represents 85,500,000 pounds. This means that if we are to come within $1,500,000 of getting the same revenue under this bill that we received in 1910 we must necessarily import in the grease and in the fabric 182,000,000 pounds more of wool than we did last year; and there can be but one conclusion, and that is that this must supplant and displace 182,000,000 pounds of wool grown in the United States. As this is about two-thirds of the entire product of the United States, it is only confirmatory of the first proposition which I made—that the bill absolutely destroys the market for the domestic grower of wool and puts him in a worse position than if we had free wool, with fabric duties sufficient to preserve the industry of manufacturing the raw material in this country.

"Which horn of the dilemma the Democratic members of the committee will take I do not know, but one thing is certain, that if this wool comes to the United States it will destroy the American market. If it does not come, they do not get their revenue.

"By way of suggestion, let me add that in this $41,000,000 of increased fabric importations there is lost to the United States about $12,000,000 worth of human labor in the manufacturing processes alone, which means the throwing of 23,000 persons out of employment in that industry.

"It is easy to be seen that there is at least reason for differences of opinion as to the value of legislation of this kind."

ROCKVILLE, CONN., June 1, 1911.

Hon. E. J. HILL, Washington, D. C.:

Letter just received to-night. We ran short time under Wilson bill and many concerns were obliged to reduce wages. Foreign mills flooded the country with goods, and it took several years for the market to recover. The proposed bill will surely put us out of business. Wilson bill was disastrous enough, and anything approaching it would tend to destroy the whole woolen industry; ad valorem duties imposed would probably be greatly undervalued, say 10 to 50 per cent, as recently happened, and we would have little or no protection under the new bill.

F. T. MAXWELL.

ROCKVILLE, CONN., June 2, 1911.

Hon. EBENEZER J. HILL,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HILL: I received your letter of 31st ultimo last night and immediately wired you a few facts regarding the results of the Wilson bill to the woolen trade, and now wish to supplement those facts, after reading and considering the new proposed Underwood woolen-tariff bill, published in this morning's paper.

The proposed bill is so much worse than the old Wilson bill that I feel sure that if it passed it would drive the whole woolen business (amounting to some $400,000,000 annually) out of the country practically.

The Wilson bill made a good start toward cleaning the woolen manufacturers out of business, and if continued a few years longer might have done it very effectually. It did allow the foreigners to flood our markets with low-priced goods, which were not consumed for a long time after the Dingley bill had become a law.

The Wilson bill gave us free raw material and 50 per cent ad valorem on our fine goods, but the proposed Underwood bill charges us 20 per cent on our raw material and only gives us 40 per cent on our goods. In order to make it anywhere near equitable as compared with the Wilson bill, we should have, under the new tariff, 60 per cent duty on our goods to equalize the 20 per cent extra charged on the raw material.

Mr. UNDERWOOD says that he expects to have $40,000,000 worth of goods imported, which lets the cat out of the bag. In other words, he wants $40,000,000 worth of goods made abroad instead of in this country; and that, of course, means the stopping of our mills here, and our workmen will be idle and suffering, and the soup houses will have to be started again, as in the time of the Wilson bill.

The Democrats apparently desire to close out the whole woolen industry and throw our product of $400,000,000 annually over to the English and Germans, resulting in the starving of our workmen in the woolen line.

If they carry their plans through Congress, they may expect an uprising in the manufacturing districts such as occurred in 1894, when Connecticut was carried Republican by 17,000 votes, as against Connecticut being carried in 1892 by Cleveland, Democrat, by 5,000 votes.

The woolen mills are beginning to feel the effects of tariff-reduction talk very seriously; our customers refuse to buy goods when there is a possibility of purchasing them later here or abroad at less price, and it is going to be a very serious matter.

Ad valorem duties are never fully collected, and no foreign country enacts such duties where it is possible to use specific duties. We have very recent evidence in the woolen and other lines of serious undervaluations, and they are going on every day, and can not possibly be stopped; but the pound duties are sure, and the Government gets its money and the honest importer gets fair competition under that method of duty.

I thank you for your letter, and will be pleased to hear anything new that you can give me.

Yours, sincerely,

FRANCIS T. MAXWELL.

Hon. E. J. HILL,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.:

Your ideas on the Schedule K are all right. Any such change as the bill proposed would mean ruination to the woolen industry of this country.

SOMERSVILLE, CONN., June 3, 1911.

Hon. E. J. HILL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I note in the morning paper that you request all woolen manufacturers interested in the proposed tariff bill recently introduced in Congress to write you their views in regard to it. I have been in the woolen business for 40 years, manufacturing woolens entirely, and, in my judgment, no tariff legislation has ever been proposed that will so seriously injure the woolen manufacture business as the proposed legislation. Our business will suffer more adversely under a bill of the character proposed than it did under the Wilson bill. Under the Wilson bill we had equally as much protection on manufactured goods as we will receive under the proposed bill, and, in addition to that, we had wool free. I note in the public press that the claim is made for this bill that it will not reduce the revenue of the Government more than one and one-half million from duties on wool and woolens below that received under the present tariff laws. If this be true, it must follow that importations of wools and woolens will be increased 100 per cent over the present amount imported. A large part of this increase would undoubtedly come from the increased importation of manufactured goods. This would result in a decreased amount of goods manufactured in this country to whatever extent the importation of manufactured goods would be increased. The results under a bill of this kind would be that the manufacture of woolens would be so paralyzed and so reduced that it would result disastrously not only to the manufacturers, but to the producers of wool as well, owing to the decrease in the amount of raw wool consumed. It is impossible for the wool grower to be prosperous and receive an adequate return for the wool he may grow unless the wool manufacturer is so situated that he can consume the wool at a profit to the manufacturing end of the business.

With 20 per cent duty on wool and a duty on goods on the same level as the Wilson bill carried, the result is not in doubt. Such a bill if enacted into law would be the greatest blow that the woolen business has ever received during the many years that I have been familiar with the business. There should be a fair duty on raw wool, either ad valorem or specific, the latter I personally favor, and a reasonable ad valorem on the manufactured goods, and in addition thereto, a compensatory duty equivalent to the ad valorem or specific duty on raw wool.

Yours, truly, GEO. E. KEENEY.

PIECE GOODS—MARKET DISCUSSES TARIFF.

Nothing had stirred the market for some time to quite the extent that the news of the proposed tariff plan has as it passed the caucus of the House of Representatives by unanimous vote on Thursday. The opinion was very general that the bill as proposed will never become a law. Briefly, so far as the trade is concerned, it affords 5 per cent less protection against the influx of imported merchandise than did the Wilson bill, and deprives of the opportunity of entering the world's market for raw wool, which condition that bill contained. In other words, if the Wilson bill was bad for the industry, the proposed plan is worse. Criticisms were of the most severe character and were apparent on every hand. The claim that the lessened revenue on raw wool will be made up by the increase in the importations of merchandise is looked upon as one of the weakest assertions favoring the change. It takes but little figuring, it is pointed out, to ascertain what this means to the American workingmen.

The difference, it is claimed, will be in the neighborhood of 60,000,000 yards, or about the production of the American Woolen Co. Obviously, this deprives employment for about 35,000 operatives, who in their turn take out of circulation, at a low estimate, $350,000 a week. When the amount which goes abroad, which includes the purchase price of the fabric, this item alone, it is said, takes $160,000,000 out of circulation in this country. Others were inclined to look upon the attempt to put through a bill of any character whatsoever in the face of an imminent report by a board of scientific experts as being of a decidedly presumptuous character. The opinion was almost unanimous that if this bill becomes a law the mills of the country may as well go out of business. Although, of course, when foreign sentiment against increased production is considered, this situation is hardly likely of development at least under a year, because of the satisfactory state of the business in those countries. They are now enjoying the highest degree of prosperity of their history, and it is said are adverse to increasing production on the same scale that is characteristic of the industry here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman on the other side to consume some time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was compelled to go away. There is nobody on this side of the House who is ready to go on, so far as I am informed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I expected some time to be used on that side of the House, and I will state to the gentleman candidly that, expecting that, I was not prepared to go on, on this side, immediately.

Mr. MANN. Let us rise.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there is anyone here, Mr. Chairman, who is ready to go on; and I wish to say to the Members of the House that I do not wish to drive the debate on unreasonably, but I do not think it is right ordinarily for the committee to rise this early in the afternoon.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will recall, his report was not obtainable until late this morning, and no one has had a chance to read it except the gentlemen who prepared it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I will not insist on going on now, but I must insist from now on. Gentlemen must hereafter be prepared to speak until at least 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. MANN. We shall do the best we can, but the gentleman will not help any in that way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All I ask of the gentleman from Illinois and his side of the House is that they also shall be reasonable. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House bill 11019, to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, June 8, at 12 o'clock meridian.

REPORT OF IMMIGRATION COMMISSION.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask leave to have reprinted, with corrections and illustrations, Senate Document No. 208 of the Sixty-first Congress, second session, being a report of the Immigration Commission on changes in bodily form of descendants of immigrants. The document has been once printed, and it has been very much called for. It was included among the reports of the commission made when the commission went out of existence the first day of the last session, but by some error it was not reported among the list of reports that should be printed. For that reason I ask for a reprint.

There being no objection, the order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That Senate document No. 208, Sixty-first Congress, second session, being report of the Immigration Commission on changes in bodily form of descendants of immigrants, be reprinted with corrections and illustrations.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution No. 62, by Mr. HEYBURN, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit information relative to the title, and so forth, of certain lands, for the purchase of which appropriation was made May 30, 1908.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I ask that it be given present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to hear the resolution read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HEYBURN, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to inform the Senate what progress has been made toward the acquirement of title by the United States to the whole of squares numbered 226, 227, 228, 229, and 230, for the purchase of which appropriation was made under act of Congress approved May 30, 1908, and if title has passed to the Federal Government, when such title passed, the consideration to be paid therefor, in detail, and whether or not the former owners or lessees now occupying said buildings are paying any rent to the United States for the use of said buildings, and the amount thereof; and also whether or not the proposed plans for the buildings to be erected for the use of the United States Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor contemplate the occupancy of any portion of the land south of B Street commonly known as the Mall.

Mr. HEYBURN. The resolution merely calls for information in regard to the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DAVIS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to present consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. It went over until to-day. I take it that it can not be sent over by an objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But it must be referred to some committee. It is not reported from any committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution, notwithstanding the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution, the objection of the Senator from Arkansas to the contrary notwithstanding. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I raise the question of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	La Follette	Root
Bailey	Cummins	Lippitt	Simmons
Bankhead	Curtis	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Borah	Davis	McCumber	Smith, S. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I renew my request for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution comes up without a motion. The Chair was in error in stating otherwise. He did not notice at the time that it is simply a resolution of inquiry. The queston is on agreeing to the resolution, and the Senator from Arkansas asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the calendar is in order under Rule VIII.

Mr. BORAH. There are Senators who desire to make some remarks upon the unfinished business, and I ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution 39 be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the main question involved here, namely, the election of Senators by direct vote of the people. The record of this question was made up, and well made up, at the last session of Congress. I am perfectly content to abide by what was then said for and against the measure; but I do desire to state my own position and my reasons therefor, and to consider in a very brief way the controversy that has arisen over the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee and the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

I have come to the conclusion that, in the interest of good government, the right to elect United States Senators should be vested in the people, as provided by both of the amendments proposed. I have reached this conclusion slowly and with great reluctance. I am opposed to any change in the fundamental law under which this country has grown and prospered for more than a century, framed, as it was, by men of distinguished ability, actuated by the most exalted patriotism, except upon the strongest necessity. But conditions have changed since the Constitution was originally adopted. Interests and influences have entered into the election of Senators as now provided for that have corrupted legislative bodies, perverted the objects and purposes of the framers of the constitution, and brought the Senate itself into reproach by corrupt practices and bribery in such elections. The existence of these influences and their potency in controlling legislative elections of United States Senators can not be denied. If allowed to continue, they must inevitably destroy our representative form of government. It is this fact, and this alone, that has brought me to the conclusion that the election of Senators can no longer be safely intrusted to legislative representatives and that the only remedy for this evil that is threatening the integrity of our free institutions is to vest that power in the people to be exercised directly at the polls.

Having reached this conclusion, I regret exceedingly that any controversy should have arisen here between the friends of the measure as to the form of the amendment to be adopted to effect that purpose. I regret it the more because this difference presents a sectional controversy that I had hoped might never again find its way into this Chamber.

The question at issue is a very simple one. It is this: Shall the elections to be held for the election of Senators be governed and controlled by the law-making power of the several States or of the Federal Government? To me it is a matter of very little consequence. By other Senators it is taken seriously, and therefore must necessarily be viewed from that standpoint. I must say, for myself, however, that there is no good reason to suppose that either a State or the Nation would neglect or abuse the power, if given to either the one or the other. But, treating it as a matter of serious consequence, let us consider briefly just what effect must be given to each of the propositions presented by the two proposed amendments.

The Constitution, as it now stands, contains the following provisions, material to be considered, all contained in Article I:

SEC. 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years.

SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

SEC. 5. Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

So, as now provided by the Constitution, six things may be taken as established:

1. Members of the House of Representatives are elected by the people.

2. Their qualifications are fixed by the Constitution itself.

3. Senators are chosen by the legislatures of the several States.

4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for both Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

5. Congress may by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

6. Each House is made the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

What effect will the amendments proposed and now under consideration have upon these provisions of the Constitution?

The proposed committee amendment contains this clause:

The terms and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

Undoubtedly this provision, if made a part of the Constitution, would vest the power of legislating, with respect to the time, place, and manner of holding elections in the several States and remove from the Constitution any express grant of power to Congress to make other regulations or to change the regulations made by State legislatures. It seems to be assumed that by this amendment the National Government will be deprived of all power to control elections for United States Senators, and that the power of the States will, if this amendment is adopted, be unlimited. But certainly this can not be true, Mr. President. No State legislature can, under the authority proposed to be given by this amendment, deprive any citizen of the rights guaranteed to him by the Constitution, or enact or enforce any legislation that would prevent a fair and full expression of the public will at the polls, because any such attempt to prevent a fair election or to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the right of suffrage would not be to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections within the meaning of the Constitution, but a plain effort to prevent such election, and would therefore be in violation of the Constitution and void. This proposed amendment leaves in full force and effect every provision in the Constitution, as it now is, intended to protect the people of this country in the right of suffrage. Any legislation purporting to prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding elections must conform to these provisions. Any attempt to deny or abridge the right of suffrage of any citizen under the guise of regulation of elections would be a palpable violation of the Constitution and utterly void. The only effect of this proposed change in the Constitution would be to deprive Congress of the power to prescribe regulations for holding the elections by direct legislation.

The proposed amendment confers no power on the States to provide for or in any way to limit or control the right of suffrage or to determine the qualifications of voters. It is limited entirely to the regulation of the holding of elections. Therefore any attempt to use this power given as a means of controlling or limiting the right of suffrage, except as to the time, place, and manner of holding the election and casting, receiving, and counting the votes of electors legally qualified to vote, would not be within such power, but in violation of it.

Any elector, deprived of his right of suffrage under the Constitution by State legislation purporting to prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding elections, would have a complete and ample remedy in the courts to declare the law unconstitutional, thus destroying its effects, not only as to him but as to all others similarly affected by its provisions. Not only so, but any citizen directly interested in the result of any election held under the law, as a candidate or otherwise, could resort to the courts for like relief.

In addition to this, Mr. President, the Senate is still the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members and possessed of ample and plenary power to unseat any person elected under any law of the States which has authorized an election in violation of the Constitution of the United States or the rights of electors entitled to vote at such an election. It may go further than that. It may deny a seat in this Chamber to any person whose election has been brought about by any unlawful or corrupt means, even under a valid statute.

So, Mr. President, the power proposed to be vested in the legislatures of the States by the amendment is not an unlimited power. It must be exercised in conformity to the Constitution of the United States and with due regard to the right of suffrage of every elector of the State, guaranteed to him by the Constitution. It is not a power to fix the qualifications of voters, but to provide proper and constitutional regulations for the holding of elections by the electors qualified under the Constitution to vote for United States Senators. That right can not be taken away, limited, or abridged by virtue of any power proposed to be given by this amendment. I maintain that the claim, so strenuously urged here, that the vesting of this power in the States will imperil the National Government has no foundation when the effect of the proposed amendment is rightly understood and considered. The whole force of this objection rests upon the wholly unfounded claim that the power attempted to be vested in the States will enable them to deny the right of suffrage to some of its citizens or limit or abridge that right. But, as I have said, no such power is given or could be lawfully or constitutionally exercised if this proposed amendment should be adopted.

Turning now to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas as a substitute for the one I have been considering: It provides, in the simplest way possible, for the election of Senators by the people instead of the legislature, and for the filling of vacancies in the same way. It leaves in the Constitution intact the provisions of section 4, providing that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for both Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but subject to the power reserved to Congress to make or alter such regulations except as to the place of choosing Senators.

This brings an outcry and protest from Senators who claim that the power should be vested in the States without any right of control or regulation by Congress. I must confess, Mr. President, that I can not appreciate the position of Senators who make this claim. I do not know how it can be seriously made. Do Senators want this supposed unlimited power vested in their States, so that they may regulate elections in a way that might call for the interference of Congress? Certainly they expect their States to keep within the Constitution, and that they will protect every citizen of every race, color, and station in life in his right of suffrage. If not, there is every reason to maintain this supervisory power in the Congress of the National Government. I have assumed that every State in the Union would, if intrusted with this power to regulate elections accept it as a sacred trust, and that no law would be enacted under it in violation of the Constitution, or of the right of suffrage of any citizen, high or low, black or white. I would not willingly assume anything else. Assuming this to be so, it is idle to say that the rights of any State will be endangered by reserving to Congress the power to change the regulations made by the State, and to make new ones of its own.

The question raised, as between these two proposed amendments is, in my judgment, given undue importance. It will undoubtedly be used—I have no doubt it is being used now on this floor—as a means of defeating any amendment of the Constitution that will give to the people the right to elect their Senators.

Mr. President, entertaining these views, I shall vote for either of these amendments that may be agreed upon. What I want is an amendment giving the people the right to elect United States Senators by direct vote. I am anxious to know which one of these proposed amendments is best calculated to bring about this final result. If I knew now, I would support that amendment without hesitation. I have been waiting patiently to be informed on this subject. When the vote comes, I shall be controlled by my best judgment, founded upon what I may then believe to be the best means of insuring the passage and final adoption of an amendment that will vest the right of election in the people.

At this time it seems to me that all friends of the measure should unite on the amendment that has already passed the House. I am willing myself to give the southern people the benefit of the doubt as to which amendment would best preserve the rights of the people, and thus secure to the States the right to provide for the manner of holding the elections. In my opinion, no harm can come from such a provision, and its adoption will be more likely to secure the final adoption and approval of the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no information that any other Senator desires to discuss the joint resolution at this time; and if there is no one who desires to do so, I shall give way, so that the calendar may be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The calendar is in order under Rule VIII. The Secretary will state the first business on the calendar.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS IN APPROPRIATION ACTS.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, what is the present legislative status of the joint resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is what I supposed. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that such a measure as this should be pressed upon the attention of the Senate. It is a violation of every rule of law and of legislative procedure, and I am amazed that any lawyer should favor a proposition that would permit the Sixty-second Congress to rewrite the Journal of the Sixty-first Congress or to amend it under any pretense whatever. I am astonished that there has not been such a protest from the lawyers, at least, of this body as would make such a proposition impossible.

On its face—and I call the attention of the Senate to it—it is—

Joint resolution to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911.

On March 4, 1911, this Congress did not exist, and the Congress that did exist at that time passed out of existence on that day. If, under the pretense of correcting a record because certain legislation has proven inconvenient to some one, a joint resolution of this kind can be adopted, there will be no stability to any law.

Upon what grounds is the passage of this joint resolution asked? Upon the grounds that some enrolling clerk or some clerk of a conference committee did not correctly report the will of the conference or the will of Congress. Congress, in the respective Houses, legislated; it went into a conference committee upon the differences between the two Houses; it was there a considerable length of time; and the conference committee reported it to this body and to the other body. The report was in writing. Upon that action each House acted. When it came in on the floor, I made inquiry of the chairman of the committee of conference representing this body whether certain items were in that bill. I made the inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not I had grounds to insist upon a further conference. I was assured that the item was there. I inspected the bill, and I found it there.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WARREN. The record does not show that.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. WARREN. The bill does not show that.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. WARREN. The record shows that the amendments which are proposed to be eliminated were, as a matter of fact, eliminated by the committee of conference and were so reported in the conference report, and that the Senate and the House voted upon and accepted that report.

Mr. HEYBURN. The record that came to this Senate for action disclosed the fact that it contained the item appropriating money for the University of the State of Idaho.

Mr. WARREN. To what report does the Senator refer?

Mr. HEYBURN. I refer to the report that was incorporated into the enrolled bill.

Mr. WARREN. There is no such report in the record, I think the Senator will find.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill is in the record, and the bill went or is presumed to have gone, under the rules of the Senate, to that committee, for the purpose of seeing to it that it correctly represented the conclusion of the conference; and the provision is in the bill that was signed by the President of this body and by the Speaker of the House. It is there; it is in the bill that was signed by the President of the United States; and it is on the statute books of the Sixty-first Congress as a law; and now in the Sixty-second Congress we are met with the proposition that upon the assertion of some one that it was an inadvertence or a mistake we should correct the record.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, it is true that the bill was signed, and so forth, but it is also true that the record shows the contrary of what the Senator contends for every step of the way.

Mr. HEYBURN. What record?

Mr. WARREN. The record of Congress; the record of this Senate and of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to be referred to the record that shows to the contrary.

Mr. WARREN. I will find it for the Senator. I had assumed that he had examined it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have.

Mr. WARREN. The bill itself, the original copy, shows that these amendments were disagreed to; the bill was so marked, and it was so reported and so voted upon by the Senate and House and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD plainly discloses the fact.

Mr. HEYBURN. I must differ with the Senator from Wyoming. We can not impeach——

Mr. WARREN. I presume the Senator is willing to admit that my assertion is as good as his until he can change it by the record. I will be prepared to submit the record to substantiate what I have stated.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am speaking of the record, not of some record that has been dug up for the purpose of laying a foundation for doing this unusual and unprecedented thing. The record of the action of this body is in such form and manner that it can not be doubted. The record of this body is in that bill as it was enrolled and as it was signed. That is the record. Now, fleeting memoranda or the memory of men are to be set up against that under or in support——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator's case is not so bad that he will be unfair about it. The records of Congress are hardly matters that can be attributed to any particular individual or a committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator from Wyoming will be much safer if he keeps the personal question out of this discussion.

Mr. WARREN. I am making no reflections——

Mr. HEYBURN. I was not reflecting upon the Senator in anything he has done or said or omitted to do.

Mr. WARREN. I am talking about the record.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am talking of a record which is the only record of the proceedings of this body. The only record that we can inquire into is the official record of the enactment of the law. How long would the Senator stand before a court pleading that notwithstanding the statute had been published as the law of the land, by reason of the misconduct or inadvertence or incapacity of some clerk, the law was not really enacted?

If we can do anything here, we must do it in the nature of a judicial consideration of this question. Legislatively we have no such power. We may usurp it; men may just simply drive this thing through; but if they do, it ought to shake the confidence of the people of the country in the stability of their laws; and it would. You would have to wait for some years until some Senators had passed away before you would know whether or not a law was going to remain a law. That would be the only position——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise simply to suggest that the joint resolution is being considered under Rule VIII, the limitation being that speeches shall be confined to five minutes. I have no objection to some Senator moving to take it up, but I think it is wise for us to adhere to the rule. There are other bills on the calendar which I should like to have considered, if possible, under that rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule being invoked, of course——

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the indulgence of the Chair and the consent of the Senate simply to say that had I supposed the rule would be invoked, I would have objected to the consideration of the joint resolution. Now, I will object to its consideration because——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over under the objection of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. WARREN. Before leaving the matter I desire to say that I shall at an early date move to take it up. Of course, I have no personal interest in it. It is a joint resolution that came from the House, as stated, to correct what seems to be error. It is the law to-day, and if the Senate desires it to stand it can easily be settled beyond cavil by allowing a vote to be taken. So, in deference to custom and to the House, I shall move to take it up and consider it at the earliest opportunity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next bill on the calendar.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WRITS OF ERROR IN FEDERAL COURTS.

The bill (S. 2509) to amend section 1004 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the section so as to read as follows:

SEC. 1004. Writs of error returnable to the Supreme Court or a circuit court of appeals may be issued as well by the clerks of the district courts, under the seal thereof, as by the clerk of the Supreme Court or of a circuit court of appeals. When so issued they shall be as nearly as each case may admit agreeable to the form of a writ of error issued by the clerk of the Supreme Court or the clerk of a circuit court of appeals.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTIONS FOR SENATORS.

The bill (S. 123) to alter the regulations respecting the manner of holding elections for Senators was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

THE POSTAL SYSTEM.

The resolution (S. Res. 56), reported by Mr. BRIGGS from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, directing the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to inquire into and report to the Senate what changes are necessary or desirable in the postal system of the United States, etc., was announced as the next business on the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the resolution may go over, as I want to look into the matter somewhat.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

RANK OF MILITARY ATTACHÉS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does that complete the calendar?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is one bill on the calendar, Senate bill 315, which was reported this morning by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 315) fixing the rank of military attachés was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to add at the end the following:

Or to reduce the rank of such officers while serving as herein provided.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter military attachés while serving on duty at embassies abroad shall have the rank of colonel, and while serving on duty at legations abroad shall have the rank of lieutenant colonel: Provided, That all officers serving as military attachés shall continue to receive the same pay and allowances which they receive under existing law, and nothing in this act shall be construed to increase such pay or allowances or to reduce the rank of such officers while serving as herein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as the newspapers will doubtless announce this evening, the Committee on Finance agreed to report the so-called reciprocity agreement out of committee on Tuesday next. I have made diligent inquiry on both sides of the Chamber whether any Senator desires to address the Senate to-morrow or the next day, and I do not find any Senator who wishes to do so. There is nothing on the calendar. In addition to the necessary time consumed in preparing the report, and, I think, some minority views on the reciprocity agreement, other important committees are to have meetings to-morrow and on Saturday. In view of that fact, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 11 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 12, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

O Thou, who art the life and light of men, the inspiration to every high ideal and worthy endeavor, broaden our intellectual conceptions, quicken every noble impulse, widen the sphere of our activities, that by the rectitude of our behavior we may become potent factors in the spread of Thy kingdom, that Thy will may be done in earth as in heaven, in the spirit of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, June 7, 1911, was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A DELEGATE.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I realize that there is a growing distaste for the "leave-to-print" practice, both in and out of the Halls of Congress, and with this feeling I have considerable sympathy. In taking advantage of the privilege to-day I have a few words of explanation to offer. On the 14th instant there will be a hearing on the subject of this study before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and it is desired that those attending, and the committee itself, shall be acquainted with the postal express proposition before the hearing. Again, it is unlikely, under our restricted program, that any bill or resolution relating to this subject will come up for discussion at this session, rendering it necessary that "matter not germane" must go into the RECORD, in order that important subjects should receive the necessary initiatory discussion, preparatory to activity at a later time.

With this frank explanation of my purpose in using the privilege, I trust I shall not be considered as in delicto to the courtesies of the House.

Moreover, it has seemed to me a public duty to present this subject at this extraordinary session, and I think that perhaps a few words of personal explanation upon its origin may not be out of place.

Before my election to the Sixty-second Congress, I may say that I had given this subject about the average attention. I did not then fully appreciate the dependency of the whole proposition upon the question of the rates for railway transportation. After my election it became my duty to make a study of the whole subject. I had, perhaps, some qualification, for I have long made railway economics here and abroad a subject of study. In December the Government issued its first annual report on the statistics of express companies for the year 1909, which developed the fact that the average pay of the express companies to the railways for carrying express matter was about three-quarters (0.74) of a cent a pound, while the postal reports show that the Government paid for its letter or mail transportation about 4 (4.06) cents a pound, barring the weight of equipment in both cases. It was apparent to me at once that the parcels function could not be successfully or economically discharged by the Government on the basis of letter-transportation rates. And then the economic significance of another fact developed: It was that the express companies' service was at a disadvantage, even greater than that of the post office, in regard to the nonrailway transportation of its parcels. The express companies have no agency and at present rates can not secure an agency to reach nonrailway or rural points. In short, it appeared that the express companies had exclusive control of one of the absolutely essential conditions of fast package transport, the express rate of three-quarters of a cent a pound, while the post office had equally exclusive possession of the other great agency of necessary service—the rural delivery system. Common sense indicated what the solution must be; these two advantages, the railway express transportation rate and the rural delivery system must be made cooperative; must be united under one control. The express railway transportation rate would, if the Government parcels amounted to but one-fourth of the express business, save it, if in its control, at least $50,000,000 a year, while the addition of rural delivery to the express business would add to this great service the farming population of our country at practically no cost to them or the country. The bill I have introduced for postal express is the result of these conditions.

PRINCIPAL PROVISIONS OF THE POSTAL EXPRESS BILL.

As I have said, the idea of the bill is to unite in one service the two great instrumentalities above named, in order that a greatly cheapened and an even more extended service to the public may be had. For this purpose the bill provides for the compulsory purchase by condemnation of the railway-express company contracts and franchises, as well as the equipment and property devoted to the express business per se, and their subsequent employment by the postal department in connection with rural delivery and the postal system. The express-railway transportation privileges are all the subjects of contracts between the railways and express companies. They constitute the primary condition of the express service, and while the equipment and other facilities are only immediately necessary to a running plant, and their acquisition is provided for, it is the contracts which constitute the conditions sine qua non of the service. Happily, there can be no legal question as to the right of the Government to acquire these contracts and other facilities upon providing just compensation. I may say at this point that under notes to the bill, printed as Appendix A, the legal and constitutional phases of the subject are severally discussed.

With this brief reference to the more general features of the subject, I will pass on to a more precise and methodical discussion of what seem to be the points more particularly worthy of attention. I shall refrain from the express or implied abuse which so many people think justified with regard to the express companies, and in order to do this will confine myself strictly to economic data and reasoning, as most likely to elucidate the truth. And I shall endeavor to make the study as brief as possible by referring all but the points of the subject to the appendices, where those who are more especially interested may find the data in its original detail.

NECESSITY FOR POSTAL EXPRESS.

In addition to those grave needs for such a service, which the majority of national communities have recognized, as commending its adoption domestically and internationally, there exist in the United States supplementary reasons which it is believed render the institution uncommonly necessary.

Briefly summarized, they are:

(a) The greater area over which our population is distributed and correlatively greater transportation distances which consume so much time by freight that a fast or express service needs to be resorted to in a larger number of instances than if the journey were short.

(b) The 100-pound minimum and corresponding charge in railway practice and the inadaptability of railway methods to diminutive consignments.

(c) The prohibitive minimum charge of the express companies in respect to small consignments.

(d) Absence of railway "collect and delivery" service and absence of "collect and delivery" service by express companies as to our farming population and a large portion of our urban population.

(e) Incalculable waste of transportation effort, so far as made, in movement of necessaries of life from the farms to points of consumption, a serious factor in our high cost of living.

Of course, the need for fast service will depend upon the greatness of the distance, when demand is immediate, as much as upon the valuable or perishable character of the shipment. In our country, with an average haul for freight of 251 miles, from three to ten times as long as in Europe, the demand for speed to overcome the obstacle of the time lost in distance, the time-element necessity for an express service is correspondingly increased; and so the disadvantages of inadequate or ineconomical express service are vital. The railway organization of America and its system of practices does not seem adapted to meet this great need; while its refusal, upon adequate grounds, to accept a smaller payment than the rate for its minimum shipment of 100 pounds precludes it from this service even if speed were not prerequisite. The minimum charge of 25 cents (average 27 cents) imposes an equally substantial and serious restriction upon the express service as now conducted; so that when it is considered that the farmers or nonurban, about half of our population, are virtually excluded from the service of this great agency, and the express rates by their prohibitive costliness substantially minimize the service for the urban population, it is apparent that instead of possessing an express service commensurate with its needs, the United States has both unexampled necessity for, and unexampled deficiency in, its dispatch or express agencies. Add to this situation the tremendous waste and corresponding costliness of the unorganized country-to-town transportation of our necessaries, and such almost equally wasteful and quite equally costly express service as we have, and have we not put a finger on one of the big leaks which swallow so much of the unprecedented productiveness of our country?

PROHIBITIVE EXPRESS CHARGES.

We should expect express charges to be higher per ton here than abroad, as much higher as our freight-per-ton charges. But no necessary economic cause is known which justifies a substantially higher proportion or ratio of the express to the freight charges here as compared with other countries. The average express charge per ton here is shown to be $31.20, while the average freight charge is $1.90 per ton, giving a ratio of the express charge to the freight charge of 16 (16.42) to 1. This express charge includes the cost of such collect and delivery service as is rendered, covering, it is thought, about 90 per cent of the traffic. In the table now inserted this element of the expense of the express companies for collecting and delivering, amounting to 11.50 per cent, is excluded, because many of the European countries and other data do not include this factor of cost. The table embraces 10 countries, while the specific data upon which the ratios are based are set forth in Appendix B. All countries have been included where the express data is clearly distinguishable from general freight statistics.

Ratios of average express charges to average freight charges in 11 countries.

Countries.	Average express charge per ton.	Average freight charge per ton.	Ratios of average express and freight charges.
Argentina	$6.51	$1.95	3.2-1
Austria	3.77	.74	5.0-1
Belgium	[1] 4.92	.53	[1] 9.3-1
Denmark	5.49	.87	6.3-1
France	6.88	.95	7.2-1
Germany	3.80	.76	5.0-1
Hungary	3.68	.93	3.9-1
Netherlands	2.43	.67	3.6-1
Norway	1.90	.49	3.8-1
Prussia	4.32	.86	5.0-1
Average for 10 countries			5.23-1
United States	27.61	1.90	14.53-1

[1] Belgium delivers parcels.

From this table it appears that while Argentina charges three times, Austria five times, Belgium nine times, Denmark six times, France seven times, Germany (including Prussia) five times, Hungary, the Netherlands, and Norway, about four times as much for carrying a ton of express as of freight, the express companies of the United States charge nearly fifteen times as much.

No further statement need be made to show that the charges of American express companies are prohibitively excessive, and such as to disqualify this service as a national economic agency. The instances given represent merchandise carried by passenger trains in all instances, and while higher charges for both the express and freight tonnage in America are justified by the longer haul, there is no necessary economic reason for a higher ratio of express charges to freight charges. The presence of the "express company" is the only circumstance distinguishing express transportation here from that of the instances cited. In those the "express company" has no part; the work is done exclusively by the railways. As we shall see later, the deficiencies of the express companies are constitutional, not gratuitous merely, and are such as can not be remedied through corporate agencies.

INADEQUACY OF VARIOUS PROPOSALS—REGULATION.

We have seen that the present express service fails to reach the farm, in itself a fundamental objection to its adequacy. It may be suggested that where its high charges are such as to inhibit the traffic, they might be corrected by appeals for reductions to the Interstate Commerce Commission. A glance at the express report for 1909, it is true, will show that the profits of the companies are clearly out of normal proportion to the investment. But it will also show that such profits amount to but 8.44 per cent of the gross receipts, i. e., to only 8.44 per cent of the rates charged. So that even if all the profits were taken away, the modified rates would show but a wholly inadequate reduction; so that the desired relief could not thus be obtained. As a matter of course, no such reduction would even be asked. No one would wish that they conduct the business without a profit. But in practice even when the justification for a reduction is present, and the power and purpose active, the regulating board will always hesitate to even substantially reduce a rate in the fear of unduly trenching on private rights.

It was this principle which Bismarck had in mind when in connection with a similar subject he spoke of—

> The attempts to bring about reform by (regulatory) laws have shown the futility of hoping for a satisfactory improvement through legal (regulatory) measures, without trenching materially on established rights and interests. (Parsons, The Railways and the People, p. 318.)

With a margin of but 8 per cent of the rate to work on, the board would feel this constraint in a marked way; for under substantially reduced rates a very slight perturbation of the customary traffic might place in danger the whole net return. Substantial relief in the way of regulation is thus shown to be wholly impracticable.

VARIOUS PARCELS-POST SCHEMES.

There remains to discuss the numerous proposals for limited carriage of parcels up to 11 pounds, and so forth, by the postal department. These all concern the present railway status quo of the Post Office. It is apparent that such proposals can only result in two things—the express companies taking the major portion of the short-haul, profitable traffic and the postal department getting the long-haul and losing traffic. But there is another fact recently disclosed by the express report—a fact rendering any of these proposals, so far as they involve railway transportation, wholly untenable.

The Post Office Department pays an average of 4 (4.06) cents per pound to the railways for carrying the mail, excluding equipment.

The express companies pay an average of three-quarters (0.74) of a cent per pound for carriage of express matter, excluding equipment.

It is manifest that not even the Government could render substantial service under conditions so utterly unequal. It could not pay—what we shall see when we come to consider the length of the express and the mail hauls amounts to—about three times as much as the express companies pay to the railways for carrying its parcels. One is mail service, which is naturally more costly; the other more closely resembles a fast freight service, which lies midway between the mail and the freight in the weight cost of railway movement.

Other difficulties in such proposals, based on the status quo of the Post Office, need only be suggested:

(a) The Government would have to install urban delivery wagons at a cost its traffic might not justify.

(b) The express companies still in the field, the wastes of service would merely be increased by the entrance of the Postal Department, and the people would have to pay it all.

(c) The Government, being a moral agent, with the inelastic rate proposed, would be at the mercy of its unrestrained competitors.

(d) The express companies' contracts with the railways permit them to reduce their compensation to the railways to the point of 150 per cent of the freight rate—i. e., from the present ratio of about 8 (7.80) to 1 of the freight rate to about 1½. Of course, they could not go to this extreme without destroying their own profits, but their contracts permit them to go as far as they might wish. Thus, while the Government in the beginning might have to pay about three times as much to the railways for its parcels per pound, in a struggle the express companies could exaggerate this disparity to any point they wished for the purpose of destroying the postal department as a competitor.

ESSENTIAL ELEMENTS OF AN ADEQUATE SYSTEM.

For the sake of brevity we state these elements categorically:

(a) Fast service.

(b) Greatest economically feasible extension of delivery and collect service, necessitating coordination with both urban and rural free delivery systems.

(c) Express railway contracts to secure the relatively low railway rates.

(d) Cheap capital charges.
(e) Reliable public-service motive.
(f) Economies of single organization, in which all existing serviceable plants should be merged.

With regard to the element of fast service, discussion is unnecessary. It is now commonly rendered by the railways for the express companies in connection with the passenger service. It seems worthy of suggestion, however, that a single organization like the Post Office might on the strong lines of traffic, where carload lots might be regularly obtainable, employ for certain kinds of matter the fast freight service, profiting enough on the carload rate reductions to fully cover the expense of delivery and collection, the regular railway 100-pound charges to be paid to the postal express by the shipper. It is further suggested that in this way agricultural products might be received through the rural free delivery in small allotments from the truck gardeners and farmers, consolidated into carload lots and conveyed on the trunk lines to the branch lines and distributed over the branches to destination by passenger trains. The Prussians do, in fact, have this latter service, for which the charge is based on a tariff of twice the freight rate, the regular service by passenger train calling for a charge of four times the freight rate. The railways would now perform such service if, of course, the collect service existed to gather the shipments from the country and assemble them. The Members can, if they wish more particular information as to the possibilities of this cheap and moderately fast service, consult Railroad Traffic and Rates, by Johnson and Heubner, volume 1, pages 250 to 288.

It is obvious that the element most wanting is the service described as "collect and delivery," necessary between consignor and railway at the beginning and railway and consignee at the conclusion of the act of transportation. Our country is utterly deficient in this respect as to the "country" or farming population. In towns of about 3,000 or 4,000 population up the present express companies do render this service for such traffic as their rates permit to move; but what is required is a service as extensive as the postal agency, which reaches cities, towns, and country with the degrees of efficiency of the urban and rural deliveries, conceded to far excel such delivery as the express companies give.

There can be no doubt that with regard to this collect and delivery the postal department is the only agency to which we can look for a service sufficiently extensive to be really efficient. It only remains to observe that with regard to the farming part of the country the service already exists in the form of rural free delivery, equipped and paid for, and actually waiting with empty wagons to receive and execute the work.

EXPRESS PAY—THE THREE-QUARTER CENT RATE.

It would not be fair, even were it politically feasible, to compel the railways to give the Government the average rate for carrying parcels they now give the express companies. While on its face it might seem like merely asking for equal rates, as a matter of practice it would be asking them to create and maintain an additional service; that is, conduct two services, one for the postal department and another for the express companies, at what would prove to be but a little or no increase of gross compensation. Moreover, nearly all their contracts with the express companies give the latter a contractual monopoly of the service, and these contracts have been approved by the Supreme Court in Express cases, One hundred and seventeenth United States Reports, page 1. While the Government might force a breach of these monopolies in its own favor, yet it is likely the courts would hold that such a proceeding amounted to taking private property for public use, and that the Government would have to pay the express companies perhaps as much as buying them out would cost.

CHEAP CAPITAL.

With reference to this element the solution is easy. The credit of the Nation is such that it can obtain its capital at a minimum cost, and an interest rate of 2½ per cent is predicated for the bonds necessary to be issued for the payment of the express properties. In this connection it may be well to suggest that Congress is not the agency, under the decisions, to which is given the power to determine the amount of the compensation to be paid for these properties. That function is discharged by commissions and courts, and so the question of the amount to be paid can not be settled by the Congress.

Congress can, however, and it should, of course, approximate what the gross cost of the acquisition of these properties would likely be; and for legislative purposes this can be sufficiently done by a reference to the general balance sheet of the express companies, which is inserted as Appendix C.

An inspection of the balance sheet shows that the items which are directly devoted to the service, and really function as express-company assets, are as follows:

Real property	$14,932,169
Equipment	7,381,405
Materials and supplies	138,210
Advance payments on contracts	5,836,666
Franchises, good will, etc	10,877,369
Total invested capital	39,165,819

The balance sheet shows other assets of $147,055,554 not devoted to the function and which are wholly separable from the express service per se, not necessary to be acquired, but which may be retained by the companies without impairment of their values. For the purposes of this measure the value of the rights to be acquired will be treated for simplicity's sake as about $40,000,000 and the annual interest charges as $1,000,000. The courts will at length determine what, in detail, the compensation shall be, and the bill provides the machinery for determining the compensation according to the usual proceedings in such cases.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE MOTIVE.

In institutions as with individuals motive is everything. The motive to serve one's self is the common motive, and to impose sufficient restraint upon its operation when too unsocial is, stated in a broad way, the principal object of government. There is much illogical complaint in this respect against what are called "public utilities." Their owners, who naturally have invested their money with the purpose of gain, are expected to behave differently from investors in general. Of course they do not, but why should we expect them to? Because they have a monopoly, it is argued. Well, this may impose an inferential duty, yet who will say that it can have any decisive influence upon the normal motive of the investor to gain all he can?

Where public needs and social considerations, as in this instance, become the principal and dominating purpose, where imperative public service is the great object to be accomplished, the world naturally has not yet found the restricted private motive adequate to the work. To illustrate: If the express companies were assured that by carrying 8,000,000 tons, at $15 per ton, they would net $11,000,000 profit, but that by carrying only 4,000,000 tons, at $30, they would as surely net $11,000,000 the private motive would be at a standstill to determine which set of rates to adopt. The slightest uncertainty as to whether the half rates might produce 1 per cent less would effectually incline it to the smaller service and the surer net return. How differently the public motive would act is seen in postal history. In a generation it has reduced the rate at home one-third, reduced it three-fifths to Great Britain and Germany, and added city and country delivery to the service. Not one of these great accomplishments for society would have been conceived, even, by the private motive, or if conceived, been at all practicable. It seems clearly apparent that the public motive alone will suffice to secure the greatest economic service, and reliance upon what is for this purpose the inferior private motive in such a service will not justify any hope for the future. It is only necessary to suggest the necessity for unity of plan, purpose, and execution in order to obtain economical results. But as to the superior efficiency of our postal system as a working organization I believe it may be of interest to speak more at length.

EFFICIENCY OF THE POSTAL SYSTEM.

There has been a disposition among a certain order of writers to refer the conceded excellency of the operation of public utilities in Germany to the military spirit or to the alleged presence there of a class accustomed to command and a working class equally accustomed to obey. Obliged to admit that Germany's experience with public functions has been satisfactory these writers insist that our democracy precludes any such hope in America. They do not speak of mere irregularities here, although these are what they hold up as evidence for inefficiency, and since such irregularities in foreign countries do not get into our press, a kind of unfavorable impression is made. Talk of postal deficits is indulged in as if such deficits were not merely definite statements of the amount of service given the public for which it is not called upon to directly pay. But the point of efficiency involves a wholly different element—the amount of service rendered by the employees. The table shows this service and its extraordinary advancement during a generation, notwithstanding the added burdens, notably, the rural free delivery.

POSTAL EFFICIENCY TABLES.

Comparative table of the number of pieces of mail matter handled per employee in England, France, Germany, and the United States at different periods.

Countries.	Average number of pieces of mail matter handled per employee in—
	1890	1895	1900	1905	1908	1909
England	22,230	28,775	28,646	31,945	31,117	.....
France	34,590	35,700	38,309	41,958	38,241	.....
Germany	17,287	15,638	20,552	22,160	25,901	.....
United States	24,611	26,235	32,569	42,739	51,591	54,239

These averages were reached by dividing the total number of employees engaged in the postal service into the total number of pieces of mail matter for the years given. In the cases of France and Great Britain the number of employees was diminished by one-fourth the estimated number employed in the telegraph and telephone service; in the German figures the same reduction for the telegraph and telephone employees is also made, but is raised to one-third in 1908. The statistics are found in the Union Postale Universelle Statistique Generale, published at Berne, Switzerland.

There are, of course, some slight differences of conditions in the work done by the respective postal plants. Postal savings and parcels are all the subjects of more extensive service in the foreign examples; but it is believed that these are much more than made up in the United States service by its low density of population, entailing greater railway mail, rural free delivery, and other work expenditures upon the average mail piece. The marked extent of this condition is shown by the mere statement of the population per square kilometer of area: 8 for the United States, 73 for France, 146 for Great Britain, and 112 for the German Empire.

MERGING OF EXPRESS PLANTS.

The measure designs merging the present express plants into one, and adding the united plant to the postal department. Only in this way can the economies of unity of service be secured, and the rural free delivery and the general clerical agencies of the postal organization be articulated to the express plants. The railway transportation of express matter would continue to be segregated from the mail as now, except in those instances where common car facilities might work to the advantage of the department and the railways. The bill provides for retaining the present express employees without civil-service examinations. In a year or two they should be placed in the same class with railway mail clerks and mail carriers as to rights and wages. The work of assimilation will doubtless take a year or more; meanwhile the employees and the public will be under the service conditions obtaining at the date of the acquisition. It would be impracticable in the extreme for the Congress to attempt to deal in detail with the new acquisitions. Only departmental knowledge and elasticity of treatment could plan and execute for the very best results. By no means the least advantage to accrue from the step would be the sure elevation of the working personnel, an extremely hard-working body of men, who do not appear to receive much more consideration from their employers than from the usually indignant consignee under the disturbing influence of the dimunitive size of the package as compared with the "collect" charge. To lift 50,000 of these men to the status of the mail clerk and mail carrier is surely a worthy purpose of government.

SAVINGS ON EXPRESS EXPENDITURES UNDER POSTAL EXPRESS.

The maleconomy of the express company régime in the United States flows from the parasitic relationship of these companies to the railways and to their complete absence of relation with the postal system. Only maleconomy may be expected where the normal agency, the post office, is deprived of its function, displaced by another organism abnormally articulated to the railway at one end and not articulated at all to the natural distributing postal agency at the other. One of its fundamental failures to properly discharge its spurious function (service to the country) has been pointed out. But the parasitic nature has not failed, for on a trivial investment in capital, functional per se, of only $22,313,575.53, it showed the typical characteristic of extracting $11,387,489.15 in profits—over 50 per cent—in 1909; while about twice as much more money is sacrificed by maladjustments of the parasitic relations, and these will now be treated.

The classification of operating expenses, under which the accounts of express companies are kept, divides the expenses into four general heads, as follows: "Maintenance," "Traffic," "Transportation," and "General expense."

"Maintenance" expenses represent the cost of maintaining the plant, such as cost of repairing and renewing buildings, wagons, automobiles, office furniture and fixtures, renewals of horses, and the cost of superintendence of such maintenance.

"Traffic" expenses represent, broadly, the cost of securing traffic, covering such items as pay of traffic managers, expenses for advertising, for printing tariffs and classifications, for memberships in commercial bodies, and so forth.

"Transportation" expenses cover the cost of conducting transportation, the plant being considered as a going concern. Under this head comes the pay and expenses of officials directly in charge of the employees; pay of drivers, porters, messengers on trains; the stable expenses, such as rent of stables, horse feed, horseshoeing; payments for loss and damage; payments for injuries to persons; rents of office buildings; stationery used in the local offices; and all similar items of expense.

Under "General" expenses comes the pay and expenses of the chairman of the board of directors, the president, treasurer, auditor, and other general officers; the salaries and expenses of their clerks and attendants; all general office supplies and expenses; law expenses; insurance, pensions, and cost of stationery and printing used in the general offices.

Each of the four general accounts to which reference has been made is subdivided into a number of primary accounts, in order to still further classify the items of expense and the saving which it is estimated can be made in operating expenses through the consolidation of the plants of the 13 separate express companies into a postal-express organization, has been calculated for each of the primary accounts. As a result of such calculation it is found that, taking the total expenses of the 13 companies for the year ending June 30, 1909, as the basis of comparison, a saving of $22,888,477 can be made, or a little more than 40 per cent of the total operating expense of $56,273,055. This saving is distributed among the general accounts as follows:

Maintenance	$1,457,000
Traffic	652,594
Transportation	17,996,750
General expense	2,782,133
Total	22,888,477

Of course there is no absolute basis on which the saving may be ascertained, but it is believed that the figures given are very conservative and that the saving will be much greater than stated. However, it is better to understate than to overestimate. Accepting, then, the figures arrived at as representing the saving in operating expenses, to them should be added taxes amounting to $906,519 and profits of $11,387,489, making a grand total of $35,182,485. From this deduct interest at 2½ per cent on $40,000,000 of bonds, or $1,000,000, and we have left a clear saving of $34,182,485.

Because of the fact that there are a great number of "common-point" offices, at which two or more—frequently seven or eight—companies are represented, all the equipment acquired would not immediately be necessary for the operation of the business, but could be reserved until the increase which would undoubtedly come through reduction in rates demanded that it be out in service. It is a fact that in many, in fact most, of the "common points"—about 8,000 in number—an increase of one-third to one-half in the equipment and facilities of any one company would handle the entire business of all companies, and in this fact lies the strongest reason why a very considerable saving can be made in operating expenses.

Among items of expense which would be entirely eliminated may be pointed out the salaries and expenses of the hundreds of clerks in auditors' offices who do nothing but prorate the percentages accruing to transportation lines for the privilege of conducting an express business over them; the salaries and expenses of other hundreds in the same offices who prorate the charges between companies on waybills originating with one company and terminating with another—through bills, as they are called. The saving in the duplication of salaries and expenses of traffic managers, solicitors, presidents, treasurers, auditors, and superintendence of all kinds must be apparent, and, in fact, the possibilities in this line appear almost unlimited.

The great amount of detail work in the express business as now conducted is well known to all who are familiar with the business, and through the elimination of a large part of the detail still further economies will be effected.

As an illustration of detail which may be eliminated, take the case of a package originating with express company A, destined to a point reached only by express company B. Company A waybills the package to a junction point with company B. On arrival at the junction point the shipment is written up on the regular form of delivery receipt and delivered to company B, which makes another waybill from the junction point to destination. On arrival at destination it is again written up for delivery. Notice the duplication of work, each of the two companies going through practically identical processes.

Systems of through cars between large centers of population could be run, thus obviating the expense of labor in unloading and reloading cars at the terminus of a transportation line. When it is held in mind that under the proposed plan it would be possible to forward these cars over any railway line or from any depot the saving effected would be considerable when compared with the present conditions, which often require that a car be unloaded and its contents hauled in wagons across a city and then reloaded into another car on a different line of road. Not only would there be a saving in labor, but also in time and in risk of loss or damage in handling.

On a gross business of approximately $132,500,000 the operating expenses show items 19, 33, and 47, amounting to $1,360,076.54, as paid for stationery, while the postal system on a gross business of $208,351,886 shows $338,805.57. An aggregate saving on these items of $561,810 is predicated, leaving about $800,000 still available for expenditure. But with the simplified condition and the possible devices for eliminating the complex and almost endless accounting it is not unlikely that a million dollars could be saved here. Take again the item of commissions, amounting to $6,621,952.63. This represents payments to railway agents whose connection with the subject would be shifted to the Post Office with but little of increased expense. Items 16 and 17, "outside agencies" and "advertising," might be almost wholly saved. But I will leave the further detail of this phase of the subject to an appendix. The statement of receipts for 1909 and of necessary expenditures under a régime of postal express, upon this reasoning as to savings, would be as follows:

Gross revenues, 1909	$132,599,190.92
Savings, net	34,182,485.00
	98,416,705.92

This saving, if applied to the rates in 1909, would have resulted as follows:

	Cents.
Actual express rate per average pound	1.56
Reduction of rate per average pound	.44
Feasible rate under savings	1.12

POSTAL-EXPRESS RATES AND THE RATE DECLENSION.

There are two factors in any rate structure which call for the first order of attention:

First. A rate sufficiently low to permit the article to move (with a profit) to its natural market and yet sufficiently large to fully pay the cost of the service.

The plan of postal express, it will be shown, reduces the rate average from 1.56 cents per pound to 1.12 cents, thus conceding to the market mobility of the article an advantage of nearly one-third.

Second. The completest simplicity in the rate structure itself.

When this simplicity can be secured in harmony with the cost of the service and market mobility of the article concerned, all is gain. But if, as in the case of many proposals, the rate is made for simplicity's sake alone and substantial differences of service elements are market mobility are overlooked, the wisdom is not unlike the false simplicity of those eastern laws which impose the same punishment for all offenses.

The bill places the entire work of regulating the sizes and conditions of packages and other conditions of shipment with the Postmaster General. It also places with him the work of rate making for the same, with the right of appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The bill does not obligate him to adopt the rate system herein proposed, and the discussion which follows is to be taken as elucidative and not as an obligatory part of the system. The rate-making agency should have the utmost freedom of power of action, so that administrative, fiscal, and public-service conditions may be adequately coordinated.

THE SQUARE-ROOT FORMULA OF RATE DECLENSION.

One of the most interesting discoveries in the history of railway economics was made by T. M. R. Talcott, of Richmond, Va., a railway engineer of about two generations' experience, who has written a modest but very useful work on "Transportation by rail."

In an investigation into transportation matters by the Industrial Commission in 1900 he stated that he was called upon to make local rates for a new line of railway. Being free from the complications of competition as to such rates, he was able to arrive at a satisfactory charge per hundred pounds to the first station, about 25 miles distant. But as to the stations farther on and greater distances, what should the rates be? Obviously they should not increase in proportion to the distance, for the element of terminal service would not increase. At what rate of increase, then, should rates for lengthening distances be computed? His conclusion was that in a rough way the rate would increase, not in proportion to the distance, but in proportion to the square root of the added distance—thus if the rate for 25 miles were 10 cents, the rate for 100 miles would be 20 cents, the square root of 25 being 5 and of 100, 10. Popularly expressed, the rate would double as the distance quadrupled. On this principle he formulated a table for the division of joint rates among participating connecting carriers known as "Talcott's tables for division of joint rates." He states that in several court proceedings as auditor he adopted this formula for division of receipts, and his reports were confirmed by the courts. I tested this rule in the largest way which seemed possible by taking the long and short hauls for local freight, with their corresponding charges, on 42 railway systems. The test showed that while none of the particular rates coincided with the formula, yet the averages of all were as—

Formula rate for long haul	$1.2774
Actual rate for long haul	1.2957

with a short-haul charge of 49.19 cents and hauls of 72.5 and 451 miles, respectively.

In these averages are included some Pacific coast freight rates, apparently made on the per mile rule, so extreme in their character that their absence from the computations would quite cover the difference between the actual and the formula rates. An inspection of English and continental freight rates shows a tendency to the same rate of declension, but I have not had the material to make definite computations as to them. But it may, I think, be stated that even as to freight rates the Talcott formula does not overstate the scale of declension.

THE RATE DECLENSION OF EXPRESS RATES.

For the purpose of adjusting its parcel charges to market mobility and to the cost of service, Germany and Austria established the "zone" idea for parcels weighing 13 to 110 pounds. The rates on a 13-pound package are here given with the mileage, and a column is added giving the square root of each distance, and what the charges would be in square-root terms of the rates for the shortest distance, if the rates were made on the Talcott formula.

German and Austrian parcels rates for different distances on 15-pound parcels, and showing rates for such distances, under the square-root formula.

Weights.	Miles.	Square root.	German rate in pfennigs.	Square-root rate.	Austrian rate in hellers.	Square-root rate.
6 kilograms (13 pounds)	46.1	6.80	30	30.60	36	36.00
Do	92.2	9.60	35	43.33	42	48.28
Do	230.5	15.17	45	66.89	54	76.30
Do	461.0	21.47	55	94.68	66	1.07.94
Do	691.0	26.29	65	118.39	78	1.32.23
	.....	.....	230	353.20	276	4.00.75

The German pfennig (0.238) and the Austrian heller (0.203) are each a little more than two-tenths of a cent, and are each the hundredth of a mark and a crown, respectively.

A brief explanation of the mathematical process involved in calculating the declension may not be out of place. Take the case of Germany, the short distance is 46.1 miles and the square root of 46.1 is 6.80. The rate for the short distance is 30 pfennigs. This rate is divided by the square root and the product found is 4.41 pfennigs. To obtain the charge on 92.2 miles this 4.41 is multiplied by the square root of 92.2, which is 9.60, and the result is a rate of 48.28 pfennigs under the Talcott formula. In all these computations the short-haul rate is taken as the base rate, which being divided by the square root of the miles of haul supplies the unit charge, which being, in turn, multiplied by the square root of the number of miles of the longer haul, produces its rate according to the formula.

It is apparent that the curve of declension in express transportation is markedly greater than in the freight. The actual German and Austrian rate declensions are 35 per cent and 31 per cent, respectively, greater than that of the formula for the zones established. The next step will be to observe whether, and to what extent, American express rates follow this curve of declension. There is added to this study Appendix E by the Interstate Commerce Commission, showing actual merchandise rates between 10 different points for distances of from 36 miles to 3,600 miles on shipments of from 5 pounds up to 100. The table following represents the averages of all the rates given in Appendix D, and gives in parallel columns tentative express rates computed on the Talcott formula.

NOTE.—The "express company rates" below the rates printed in italic in table exceed in amount what the Talcott formula would give. The like rates in the columns above and to the left are much less than if computed by that formula. All of the "tentative postal express rates" are according to the formula.

It should be noted that the tentative rates from 5 to 40 pounds are specially loaded to cover their relative cost of terminal service.

It must not be concluded from the manner in which the American freight, German and Austrian, or American express rates approach to or fall below what is here denominated the "square root curve," that any of the rate makers acted on the formula, or even had it in mind. The freight rates of the 42 railways referred to would rather indicate that the rate makers were aiming at a target, the exterior outlines of which could be dimly seen, but the center point of which was not visible; and while the individual rates usually approximated, they did not coincide exactly with the Talcott scale. I think, however, that a system of express rates formulated on this principle, while giving mobility to traffic covering long distances, would be ample to cover the relative cost of the service.

SIMPLICITY OF RATES.

The importance of having a simple formula by which, the weight of package being known, the application of a scale to a map would readily determine the charge, is obvious. Devices for this purpose at once suggest themselves. Each county might be regarded as a point, and measurements to that point from like points could easily be made. Each post office, or habitual user of the service, might attach to a pivot set at the point of sending a scale to rotate to any desired point, and adjoining the point of destination, the scale would show the cost, according to the pounds in the package, without the possible errors of computation. Fractions of the square root would of course be rejected. Stamps or printed slips attached to the package, stamped with number of office and of package, and date, would also show weight, character, insurance, and distance of shipment, supplying automatically a record of the pounds and pound-mileage for each office, and, as desired, the like data for the whole country. All this by the simple expedient of printed identification slips or stamps adapted to the different weights and distances, and arranged in a cabinet as passenger tickets may be seen in ticket offices. Under existing circumstances there is no rule by which one can determine the cost of shipment, short of application for quotation of the rate, at the express office.

And with respect to the number of express rates and their complexity the situation is not fundamentally different from that of freight rates. An inspection of the division of express rates and tariffs in the Interstate Commission shows 8 shelves, each approximating 120 feet in length, filled with these express tariffs, filed like books—or 960 feet of library shelving. If anyone should think this a matter of small significance let him consider the complexity in mere numbers alone of the freight rates of the country, said to be over 800,000,000,000, one of which is the right, and all the others the wrong, rate for the shipment at hand.

BASIS OF TENTATIVE POSTAL EXPRESS RATES.

The express report for 1909 shows the average product of all the express rates to have been about 1½ (1.56) cents per pound. From this table it appears that the traffic at 1.74 cents per pound produces 83.69 per cent of the revenue; that the traffic at 0.93 cent a pound produces 14.64 per cent of the revenue; while from that conveyed at 1.49 cents per pound less than 2 per cent (1.69) is realized.

BASAL RATE.

Entering into the structure of the tentative postal express rates are three inferential facts, upon the approximate validity of which depends their general accuracy. These facts are summarized:

(a) The average haul of 196 miles.

(b) The average charge per pound of 1.12 cents.

(c) Sufficiency of loading for light parcels.

The average length of haul for freight is known to be 251 miles (251.1) for 1909, the average having increased to that figure from 242.73 in 1900. There are no reports of the express companies which show the average length of haul for express matter. It is believed that it may exceed the freight haul, and is very unlikely to be less, and the reasons for this belief may be worthy of statement. A reference to Appendix A shows that seven countries specifically report the express and freight hauls, and for these countries the average express haul is 68.7 miles and the freight 66.7 miles, showing a percentage of about 3 per cent in favor of the former.

Being obliged to resort to inference as to the haul in the United States, there are several peculiar circumstances to be noted. First, the exceptionally high express charges here as compared with those of Argentina and Europe, and here the question arises, What would their effect be on the length of the American haul? At first blush it might seem that they would tend to restrict the traffic. This I believe is true. Doubling the charges in the passenger traffic would probably reduce the passenger mileage by a percentage approaching one-half and greatly reduce the average journey. But the cases of the express and passenger traffic are not wholly similar. There is practically no declension of the rate with the increase of the passenger journey. As we have seen, the case is wholly different with respect to our express rates. There is a marked declension for increasing distances in express transportation, and so it seems reasonable to say that while our express rates probably do greatly reduce the volume of the possible traffic a like effect on the length of the haul is prevented by—

(a) The marked declension in the rate for long distances; and

(b) The greater necessity for express or dispatch speed on account of the greater distances themselves.

It is probably the exaggerated necessity flowing from this cause that helps to lift the volume of the American traffic to within some relation to the volume in other countries.

I think it is not improbable that the express haul here not only exceeds the freight in length, but that 300 miles is an approximation of its length. However, to be manifestly safe, I have adopted 196 miles as the average haul in constructing the table that follows, as well as in the general table of tentative rates for all other distances, which precedes.

RATE OF 1.12 PER POUND FOR AVERAGE HAUL.

The tables accept this datum as the cost of the average pound under postal express for the average distance. It is a deduction from the argument on "savings" according to which the express work of 1909, which represented gross charges of 1.56 cents per pound, can be accomplished under postal express at about $1\frac{1}{10}$ (1.12) cents a pound. It is not thought that the limits of this base would involve any risk of trenching on the ability of the service to fully pay its way. The practical certainty that the haul is from 25 to 50 per cent greater than predicated for the expense of the transporation rate would in practice show a profit on this rate of from 10 to 20 points on the transportation element, amounting to 0.74 cent a pound. There is besides the special loading of the pound rates of from 6 cents to 2 cents on the parcel of from 1 to 40 pounds, which is designed to protect the service cost with adequate revenue. But this service is already paid for in the case of rural free delivery, and a substantial gain in revenues over expenditures should be realized from this special loading.

In order to clarify, a table is now presented, giving rates for the average haul on parcels from 1 to 50 pounds and for 60, 70, 80, 90, and 100 pounds in weight, showing the portion of the base charge per pound—that is, of 1.12—which is assigned for "transportation," "express general expense," "collect and delivery," and "special collect and delivery." There is also presented the present average express charge and the charge under the several parcels-post bills, proposing a rate of 8 cents a pound.

The foregoing table is designated to cover the statistical average haul, set here as 196 miles, but believed to be in fact about 300 miles. Excepting those rates below 50 pounds, which are specially loaded, the tentative postal-express rates are computed by dividing 1.12 by the square root of the assumed average haul, 14, which produces eight one-hundredths of a cent (per square-root unit) per pound. Thus, if it be desired to find the rate on 100 pounds for 3,600 miles, the square root of which distance is 60, this square-root number is multiplied by 8 and the product multiplied by the number of pounds, which gives the rate as $4.80, equaling $96 per ton, the average express company rate now being $297 per ton. Of course there could be no traffic to speak of at these company rates, so that their elimination would not actually affect the receipts of the railways, while the postal-express rates, which would render such traffic feasible, would greatly advantage all.

It is to be noted that of the three classes of traffic the gross income per pound for which is given, in the report of 1909, as 84 per cent at 1.74 cents and 1.67 per cent at 1.49 cents, all much above the 1.12 base adopted in this study, there is also a third line of traffic producing 14.64 per cent of the gross income, which was carried at 0.93 of a cent per pound. These rates—0.93 on a pound—would of course continue to operate until the development of the system enabled the postal department to reform if not to reduce them. The shipments in this class consist of packages exceeding 100 pounds in weight, and the relatively low rate at which the companies appear to have carried them suggest the commodity rates of an ordinary freight tariff. They suggest, too, that the Postmaster General could very probably employ such commodity rates to save the fruit growers' crops from going to waste in the fields because of inhibitory express rates while the consumers were demanding an increased supply. But the data is insufficient for definite discussion of this portion of the subject, and so I leave it. In the computation of prospective receipts, as a whole, from the proposed rates, the tentative rate revenue produced is only predicated of the traffic hitherto moving on the average major rates, and the revenue from the 0.93 of a cent a pound traffic is accordingly computed.

DEVELOPMENT OF TRAFFIC.

It is believed that a great increase of the traffic would result from the reduction of the rates and the extension of the service beyond the cities to the country. That the traffic is now laboring under a radical restriction of volume because of the inhibitory charges and the exclusion of the rural population becomes apparent in its absolute and relative quantity when compared with the express traffic in other countries. A table is now inserted giving comparative data in this respect:

Ratios of express to freight traffic in several countries.

Countries.	Ratios.		Per capita
	Express.	Freight.	Express.	Freight.
			Pounds.	Tons.
Argentina	1	64	165	5.34
Austria	1	97	117	5.63
Belgium	1	82	199	8.16
France	1	53	141	3.74
Germany	1	113	140	7.99
Hungary	1	84	68	2.77
Average (except United States)	1	82	138	5.61
United States	1	165	99	8.15

From this table it appears that the ratios of the express weights to the freight weights is only one-half here of what it is abroad, while the freight traffic per capita here exceeds the average freight traffic abroad by 31 per cent. The express traffic abroad exceeds that here by 39 per cent, and the express figures do not include the weights of the parcels carried by post abroad, which would further accentuate the disparity.

It appears from the express report that the ratios of the charge made by the railways to the express companies here for carrying express parcels is as 7.8 to 1, a ratio which, excluding the express element, is itself greater than the ratio of the whole express charge abroad. If the volume of the express business in the United States were made normal, the railways themselves would reap a greater increased revenue, even at a considerable reduced transportation charge. It is believed that as this increased to a normal traffic of nine or ten or more millions of tons, instead of the four and a half millions of tons now realized, it is perhaps not too much to hope that the transportation pound rate might fall from 0.74 to 0.50 or thereabouts. Even with such an approach to the normal the transportation rate per ton would be far above the usual and the revenue to the railways from a service not operatively more costly would be about $100,000,000, as against their present revenue of about $64,000,000.

POSTAL EXPRESS RAILWAY PAY.

The basis of the contracts of the railways with the express companies for the railway share is a percentage of the charge per package made by the express companies and a summary of the contract is added to this study as an appendix. When the package traverses more than one line compensation has to be made to the different railway companies for each such package, and the percentage going to each railway is computed in one of two ways—the mile prorate, in accordance with the length of the participating railway, or the rate prorate, giving each railway compensation as if there were as many shipments as participating railways, or both methods may be applicable to shipments over different lines.

The computation of railway compensation is monthly, and each bill of lading must be consulted and the percentage computed for this purpose. The labor of accounting for packages on one-line traffic is costly in the extreme, but when it is multiplied by two or more railways and two or more express lines the labor becomes stupendous. It is proposed to eliminate this waste of accounting to realize a saving the amount of which can hardly be justly stated in smaller terms than its total cost. Instead of computing the amount due each railway from each piece, the bill provides for weighing the express matter at stated times to determine its gross and average weight as a basis of payment to the railway. Let it be said that on a given line of railway the gross weight were found to be 50,000 tons and the gross railway revenue from it were $750,000, or $221 per mile. This weight and compensation would give the operative rate per pound under the respective contracts and a basis for future payments. This change in the method would be important for another reason, outside of the saving, which would make it imperative that the railways and the department adopt it. By it, even under the proposed reduced rates, the railways would be secured a fixed compensation per pound—that is, an average rate for the average railway of 0.74 out of the 1.12 cents per pound, or 66 per cent of the rate, giving the same gross revenue on the weight of traffic that they now receive. But if the rates were reduced and the compensation were computed according to the practice under the contracts, they would receive only 47.53 per cent of such reduced charges. Thus both parties would have controlling financial motives to employ the gross weight rather than the piece method; for if the department urged the old method it would have the terrific accounting bill to pay, while the railways would have their compensation reduced by from $4 to $5 a ton on the basis of an unchanged percentage of rates reduced from one-quarter to one-third or more. As to a matter that appeals so strongly to the financial interests of both parties and involves an obvious public service, there can be no question that the method provided by the bill would prove more than acceptable. The railways themselves have come to show a reasonable attitude to the public, and that part of the public which gives attention to transportation matters is not willing that the railways should be plainly wronged.

During the life of these railway-express contracts, and they run for various periods, their terms, when thus acquired by the Government, would be scrupulously observed by both parties except as changed by mutual consent. That under the changed order of things they would be so changed for mutual advantage is certain. Whether before or after their expiration one of the changes not unlikely would be from the package basis of payment to the car-space and mileage standard with differential charges for less than full loads on the principle now applied to carload and less-than-carload freight. This would protect the railways on the lines of both light and heavy traffic and give the postal department practical liberty to adapt its rates to moving the largest economically feasible amount of traffic. However this may be, after the contracts expire the Postmaster General is empowered to make new ones and to guard against serious error. Appeals for all parties from these contracts are provided to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and from it to the Court of Commerce. A just conclusion is always to be desired, and under the circumstances an intelligent department and railway administration would hardly fail to see that the promotion of the traffic and the broadest extension of the public service would be the surest guaranties of profit to all concerned.

MISCELLANEOUS REMARKS.

Naturally there are minor features of the express business, as now conducted and as proposed, that have escaped discussion in this study. One of these is the money-order business. The postal system is so obviously fitted to discharge this work that further comment is not thought necessary, except to say that the bill specifically covers this feature.

It may, too, be suggested that no allowance has been made in the chapter on savings for the increased cost of placing the express employees on the postal plane of hours and wages. This very substantial feature has not been overlooked. It is considered that the low rates and the added rural traffic would double the business in a year, and from its increment much more than enough surplus income would flow to cover such items. What is actually expected is that the traffic in a few years would increase to about 16,000,000 tons per annum, including the country-to-town traffic now nonexistent. As the autotruck becomes cheapened and further simplified its use would be justified for reasons of economy and service.

Other features of the general subject are purposely omitted as tending to excite feeling only, while many of its incidents will await the developments of the discussion. It is thought that the controlling elements have been dealt with, and that the data necessary to form judgment upon the merits of the proposition have been presented.

POLITICAL FEASIBILITY.

Independently of the matter of fact disclosures brought out in this study which seem to have thus far escaped public notice, public dissatisfaction with the express company has reached the point of emphatic intolerance. I do not repeat or even refer to recent incidents and events, except to say that the express company employees and their compulsory patrons have shown and are showing this disposition. It is perhaps literally true, for various causes, that these companies have no friendly support except from their stockholders, and not from all of them; and when it is considered that the express company is not a normal transportation agency, but an economic parasite existing as a squatter on the postal function, and like other parasites feeding at an inordinate expense to the sustaining subject, it may be realized that this dissatisfaction is likely to last. One needs only to refer to the fact that only in the United States and its economic dependencies, Canada and Mexico, does the express company exist. The express part of the function elsewhere is always discharged by the post and the railway, the former performing the collect and delivery service in Belgium, Austria, and Germany up to the 110 limit, entailing but one profit, the railway profit, which, as we have seen, can be kept within bounds, and excluding the express company profit, which, in its nature, defies prudent and effective reduction, although constituting an egregious percentage on the actual investment. When all this is taken with the exorbitant rates and the inadequate service the constant feeling of alienation of the public toward these companies is comprehensible enough. The people are demanding an effectual remedy and are ready to act. The Parcels Post Conference, called by the Postal Progress League, which met in Washington on the 25th of April, gave definite voice to this demand in the following resolution:

That this conference urges upon Congress that it favors the widest extension of the postal function of the Government in the form of a postal express for the carriage of parcels.

That among the essential features of such a system we feel called upon to insist upon the following:

1. Complete monopoly in the postal system for the transportation of all matter by law made mailable.
2. Rates therefor sufficient to pay the cost of the service.
3. Provision for the insurance of mail matter at reasonable rates.
4. And further, since the express companies under their contracts with the railways are securing an average rate of three-fourths of a cent per pound, and the Postal Department is paying an average of 4 cents per pound for mail matter, Congress is urged to consider whether the postal function should not properly be extended to include the express service, thus securing for the transportation of parcels the rail rates of the express companies, etc.

THE OPPOSITION.

To a large extent the railways are the stockholders. Their managers are sufficiently intelligent to understand inevitable tendencies. They know the status quo certainly involves reductions of the express rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which would automatically reduce the express-railway pay. If the reductions only amounted to 10 per cent, the railways would lose over $6,000,000 in their compensation, since the express contracts provide not for fixed or pound compensation, but for a percentage of the express rates as collected. Moreover, the railways will also see that a system of postal express would inevitably treble the traffic, so that in a year or two the $60,000,000 they now receive from this source would mount to over a hundred millions, at an inconsiderable additional cost to the plant. The railways will likely see, as well, a fine opportunity to substantially promote the public welfare, with resuts to themselves as beneficial as to the country at large.

There is no negative opposition—I mean there is no inertia of public opinion on the subject. There is perhaps no reform as to which there has been a longer, a more persistent, or a more general demand for congressional action; and perhaps there is no other single failure of Congress to gratify public demand that has produced so much of the spirit of distrust existing among thoughtful people toward their Representatives. Former Members of this House will, I am sure, appreciate the force of this statement.

APHORISTIC STATESMEN.

There is a growing suspicion of the intellectual fitness, if not of the sincerity, of public men who are so willing to serve the people during their campaigns, but who, in office, always meet proposals in the public interest with some killing adage or other, such as "The least government is the best government," "Concentration of power," "Paternalism," and so forth. These maxims, mostly invented in the eighteenth century, were designed to fight injustice and tyranny and not to defend them, to make government more democratic and its agencies more truly promotive of the public welfare. As adages they served their purposes at the time, but it is hardly sane to accept them now as scientific formulæ for the determination of twentieth-century programs of improvement and as substitutes for the consideration of measures on their merits. That the best modern thought discountenances such inconsiderate use of mere apothegms needs hardly to be proved, yet I am sure the reader will feel interested in an appendix to my remarks giving the views of America's foremost sociologist on this subject. I should not leave this paragraph without saying that the proposition is not new in any sense except in our provincial neglect to follow the examples of all other nations; that the post office would not be trespassing on an alien function, but merely extending its administration to fully cover a field of its own and discharging a function it alone can efficiently discharge.

ADVANTAGES OF POSTAL EXPRESS.

In three years under a postal administration it is believed that the reformed system will produce:

(a) A minimum charge of 7 cents for the first pound, graduated to 17 cents for a 11-pound package, for average distances.

(b) General reductions of about 28 per cent in all merchandise charges.

(c) The extension of the service to the out-of-town and agricultural population.

(d) The elevation of the employees to the plane of the postal service.

(e) The coordination of country supply of the vital necessaries with urban demand by a cheap and regular collect and delivery service.

(f) As a result, a greater attractiveness in rural life and improved highways.

(g) In 10 years' time, with the development of the traffic, a reduction of rates to about one-half of the present rates.

It is as difficult to describe in detail the manifold economic and social results of a great agency like this as to give a bill of particulars of the benefits of the postal system. And in this connection it seems not irrelevant to suggest that a proper coordination of the railway mail with the railway express service may indeed render penny postage feasible. As things are now the rural free-delivery agency does not bring a direct fiscal return to pay for itself. In a few years, as the traffic develops in parcels and agricultural products, the proposed system would enable it to do so. This would assure a considerable financial gift to the account of penny postage.

THE AGRICULTURAL POST.

In the present state of things the truck farmer must devote a large part of his time to marketing; that is, to the transportation of his product, however little it may be, to the place of demand. He must also for this purpose provide himself with transportation facilities, however small his business. These involve a horse, and its maintenance and care, and a barn; and the expense of both during the unproductive seasons. And yet in a socio-economic sense his work and expense of transportation is the smallest element in his service to the public, although it requires the maximum of upkeep work and expense, if not of capital. The proposed postal collect and delivery eliminates all these, and would enable the truck farmer to enter into the business on a minimum of capital, and pursue it on a minimum of labor and expense. The field service of a horse he could hire as occasion might require. Thus the truck-farming industry would receive a necessary impetus and the cost of such foods be greatly reduced to the consumer, saying nothing of the advantage in quality coming from a speedier forwarding to the market by daily allotments instead of the delays now incurred to garner a worth-while load.

This application of postal express, with its thoroughly articulated service and regular schedules, may be taken as illustrative of the close relations which may be established between the rural producer and town consumer, as well as between producers and merchants generally. A most interesting monograph, "An agricultural parcels post," by the Hon. J. Henniker Heaton, M. P., is inserted among the appendices. While this subject is dealt with here in a few words, it is none the less true that the farm and suburban forms of production can be so articulated with the points of consumption as to prove of inestimable value to both. A lively description of the system in Germany, by the Hon. J. C. Monaghan, formerly American consul there and now of the Department of Commerce and Labor, is also given in the appendices.

It is manifestly unfair to the proposition to judge its social value on a mere computation of the savings in rates which may be made. While this saving would amount to some $35,000,000 a year on the traffic of 1909, and from seventy to a hundred millions a year when the traffic reaches its normal dimensions, yet as large benefits will follow in clearing the prohibitive rate clogs from this necessary conduit of commerce that it may freely discharge its normal output, in placing the 50,000 express employees on a postal basis, in rendering it easier to engage in and market food production, to relieve the towns and cities of high prices for necessaries of life, and relieve them, too, of the overplus of labor, and, perhaps, too, in aiding in reversing that tendency of population movement from the country to urban centers to which is due the most aggravated and most discouraging social problems of our time.

CONCLUSION.

I have approached this subject from the standpoint of a transportation economist, if I may assume so much, and may say that the bases of the study are much more than sustained by the facts. I do not think the step is radical, except, perhaps, in the sense of the country's doing rightly and thoroughly that thing which must be done by it in some way. Surely the people are entitled now, after two generations of deprivation, to a thorough system. The aggravated conditions of our high cost of living, and the apparent connection of an agricultural rural and railway post with their practical relief, saying naught of the other necessities for such a system, seem to justify the means I have taken to present the subject to the country.

APPENDIX A.

A bill providing for the condemnation and purchase of the franchises, etc., of the express companies of the United States and the establishment of postal express.

CONDEMNATION OF EXPRESS COMPANY FRANCHISES.

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote the postal service and more efficiently regulate commerce between the several States, the Territories of the United States, the District of Columbia, the possessions of the United States, and foreign nations, the contracts and agreements (note 1) and arrangements of the several express companies with the several railroad companies of the United States, its Territories, and the District of Columbia relating to the carriage and transportation (and storage and care) by such railroad company of parcels, packets, and packages, and other express matter, as well as the franchises, operating equipment, cars, vehicles, horses, buildings, leases, as lessees, of buildings used in the conduct of the express business, and all other property or rights and privileges owned and used by such express companies as necessary and appropriate to such dispatch, receipt, collection, delivery, or transportation of such parcels, packets, packages, and express matter are hereby declared to be, and the same are hereby, condemned and appropriated (note 2) to and for the use of the United States of America, to be used by it for such public purposes as may be proper in its various functions. That the words "express company" as used in this act shall be construed to include any corporation, individual, partnership, association, or joint-stock association (as far as) engaged in the dispatch of parcels, packets, packages, and other express matter by railway, express, or steamship, including the receipt, collection, or delivery of the same. And the words "railroad company" shall be construed to include any transportation agency as far as used as a post route or in carrying express matter (note 3). On and after July 1, 1912, any railroad, steamship, or other transportation agency having a contract with any express company subject to this act shall transport and carry for the Post Office Department all matter transportable under said contract, and shall execute and perform with respect to such Post Office Department all such duties as have been customary under such contract in relation to the express company or companies named therein, and shall permit its agents and employees to continue to discharge such services in respect thereto and upon like terms without interference on its part. And as to all matter transportable under such contract the Post Office Department shall have a monopoly of the express transportation therefor.

DUTY OF PRESIDENT AND POWERS OF POSTMASTER GENERAL.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the President, on the 1st day of July, 1912, to take charge and possession of all the property of such express companies condemned and appropriated in section 1 of this act, in the name of and by the authority of the United States of America (note 4), and thereupon it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to employ said property and facilities as hitherto employed, in conjunction with the postal service, and to henceforth conduct said express service; and he shall have power—

(a) To devise classifications of parcels, packets, packages, and other shipments of postal-express matter, and to regulate the forms and conditions for the shipment thereof.

(b) To fix the postal charges for collecting, receiving, transporting, by railroad or otherwise, and delivering of matter under paragraph a, and such charges may be entire for the whole service performed.

(c) And he shall base such postal charges upon the amount of service to be rendered, considering distance transported and other service elements and risk involved therein, with a purpose of making the charges wholly adequate to paying the cost of the service, including interest charges.

(d) To make all regulations which may be necessary for insuring payment of charges and the safe, expeditious, economical, and profitable administration of such postal express service.

(e) To make regulations defining the rights and duties of the employees in such service; and he shall retain, so far as necessary, those formerly employed by the express companies, who shall not be required to pass civil-service examination.

(f) To determine by regulation the wages payable to such employees, the sick leave or vacation periods, and the necessary qualifications of employees for service and promotion.

(g) To provide for a system of insurance of employees against accident, to be paid for by the department.

(h) To declare by rules under what circumstances, and to what extent, postal express matter may be insured against loss, and provide rates for the special insurance thereof, and rules for the indemnification of shippers.

(i) To make agreements with carrying railroads or other agencies of transportation, for the carriage or extension of service, of such postal express matter, subject to the appeal hereinafter provided, to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

(j) To establish, from time to time, and in such places as he may by rule determine, rural collection and delivery, and urban collection and delivery, for such parcels, packets, packages, and postal matter and express matter as he may determine upon, and under such regulations as to rates and conditions of carriage thereof as he may deem prudent.

(k) To provide as far as possible for the exemption of postal express employees from labor on the Sabbath.

(l) To make all other regulations necessary for the efficient and economical operation of the service, and to provide all means necessary for the safe and expeditious transportation and forwarding of money and credit, to any amount, and to fix the rates therefor, and to make all regulations deemed essential thereto, and to provide means to discharge all other functions, which he may deem proper, hitherto discharged by express companies, and to make any regulations deemed essential in relation thereto.

But from any action of the Postmaster General in declaring regulations under paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (i), and (j) hereof, an appeal shall lie by any party competent under the act to regulate commerce to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall have power to revise and amend the said regulations. The Postmaster General shall also have power to rent, lease, or purchase real estate and personal property, supplies, cars, and equipment for use by his department in the operation of such postal express. He shall have power to condemn in the name of the United States any property, real, personal, or mixed, which he may deem necessary for the efficient operation of the service, but the said Interstate Commerce Commission shall first value and file its award therefor, as hereinbefore provided.

COMPENSATION FOR RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

SEC. 3. During the months of August and December, 1911, and April, 1912, the weights of matter carried over the respective railroads under contracts with the express companies (during the pendency thereof) shall be carefully taken for each railroad company in respect to such contract; and the amount of money paid for the carriage thereof shall be divided by the mileage of such railway over which such matter is carried; and thereafter the Postmaster General shall, if the railroad company consent thereto, cause to be paid to such railroad company the amount per mile owing to such railroad under such contract as thus computed; and thereafter, annually, at such times as may be determined upon by the Postmaster General, such matter shall be weighed, and the railroad company shall be paid monthly for the excess weight carried by it, over the first weighing herein provided, such sums as may be agreed upon for such excess weights; but if said Postmaster General and such railroad company shall fail to agree upon a different basis of compensation for such excess weights, then the same shall be paid for according to the terms and provisions of the contract condemned in such case.

RENEWAL OF TRANSPORTATION CONTRACTS.

SEC. 4. At the expiration of any contract between an express company and a railroad, condemned by this act (or at any time before, if such railroad company shall consent thereto), the Postmaster General may contract with such railroad company for the transportation of postal express matter; and, if deemed advantageous, upon cars provided by the department, which may be transferred without unloading onto the lines of other railroad companies, and at such rate of compensation and upon such principles of computation thereof, by car or car space mileage, or otherwise, as may be agreed upon. But an appeal shall lie, for the purpose of review, to the Interstate Commerce Commission by any party competent under the act to regulate commerce from such contract, whereupon the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to revise and amend and define and declare the terms and conditions of said contract. And in case the Postmaster General and such railroad company, after the expiration of the contract with an express company, shall fail to agree upon the terms and provisions of the renewal thereof, they shall submit their respective contentions and propositions with reference thereto, to the said Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall thereupon have plenary power to declare the terms and provisions which said contract shall contain. And from any determination with respect to any contract the terms and provisions of which have been declared by the said Interstate Commerce Commission under this section, an appeal shall lie to the Court of Commerce, which shall enjoy like power to revise and amend the same.

APPRAISEMENT OF EXPRESS COMPANY FRANCHISES, ETC.

SEC. 5. Immediately after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to appraise (note 5) at their true market values the contracts, agreements, franchises, equipment, buildings, and other property of whatsoever kind, condemned and appropriated by the United States in section 1 of this act, and award to the respective express companies just compensation therefor. Each commissioner shall take oath to justly perform such duty before some judge of the courts of the United States. The said Interstate Commerce Commission shall have power and it shall be its duty to summon witnesses, with books and papers, before it for either of the parties and require such witnesses to testify, and it shall give to each party a full hearing with reference to the amount of compensation which shall be awarded to each express company under this act; and it shall be the duty of such commission, on or before the 7th day of May, 1912, to file a separate award of appraisement, giving just compensation to each express company for its property condemned under this act, and give notice of the filing of such award to the Postmaster General and to such express company. And if either party shall be dissatisfied with the amount of said award, the same may, on appeal by either party, be reviewed and revised by the Court of Commerce, sitting as a court of review, with respect thereto; and from its determination a further appeal may lie on behalf of either of the parties to the Supreme Court of the United States, to determine the amount of the just compensation to which said express company shall be entitled.

PROVISIONS FOR COMPENSATION OF EXPRESS COMPANIES.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make payment to such express companies of the money adjudged to be due them as aforesaid out of the Treasury of the United States, and said express companies shall be entitled to payment of such final award as compensation from the Treasury of the United States, and the amounts of said award are hereby appropriated to the parties entitled thereto out of the Treasury of the United States. Any party interested in the distribution of such compensation money may petition the circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of the subject matter, which court shall thereupon distribute the compensation directly by proper audits to the several stockholders, bondholders, partners, or individuals entitled thereto; and in such cases the Treasurer of the United States shall pay out such compensation as such court may direct; and the parties to whom the same may be paid shall assign their rights unto the United States with reference thereto, whereupon the United States shall enjoy the same rights and the same power under the same as the assignor enjoyed prior to such condemnation.

ISSUE OF BONDS AND REDEMPTION OF THE SAME.

SEC. 7. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be issued in proper form the bonds of the United States of America in a sum equal to the aggregate valuation of such express companies, as determined by the awards hereinbefore provided for. Said bonds shall be payable within 40 years from the date of issue and bear interest at the rate of — per cent, and such Treasurer shall maintain a fund for the payment of such interest and the redemption of the bonds issued under this act; and for such purpose the Postmaster General shall pay out of the receipts of his department, under the Secretary of the Treasury, a sum equal to such interest and a redemption sum equal to 1 per cent of the aggregate awards to such express companies each year, which sum shall be payable quarterly. The said fund shall be invested from time to time in such securities as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem secure and profitable. The sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States to the Postmaster General and the Department of Justice, to be used, so far as necessary, upon their order, in defraying the expense incident to acquiring such property.

APPENDIX D.

POSTAL RAILWAY MAIL PAY PER POUND.

There is a most exhaustive report on postal operations, published in 1910, called Cost of Transporting and Handling the Several Classes of Mail Matter, etc. Page 8 gives the weight of freight and domestic mail, excluding local, as 1,204,080,927 pounds; and pages 7 and 10 give the items of $44,267,507.13 and $4,638,971.51, respectively, as the amounts of compensation paid for railroad service and railroad post-office car service, or a total of $48,906,478.64. Dividing this sum by the number of pounds of mail we have 4.06, or practically 4 cents a pound. The above weight excludes the equipment, and so the weights given for the express companies also excludes the equipment, such as steel safes, etc. On substantially all the main lines of postal traffic the minimum scale of railway pay has been reached, so that the postal traffic as at present would not materially reduce the rate per pound. On page 8 of the report the average haul of third and fourth class mail is given as 672 and 687 miles, respectively, making an average of 679.5 miles. The assumed haul of express is 196 miles, although it is likely about 300, and the pay to the railways 0.74 of a cent a pound. On the principle of the rate declension for lengthening hauls, elsewhere discussed, as the square root of 196 is 14 and of 679.5 is 26.06, parcels traveling 196 miles on present postal railway pay would cost 2.18 cents a pound, or nearly three times as much as (0.74) the express companies pay; while if the express haul is 300 miles, as believed, the cost would be 2.70 cents per pound, or just three and one-half times as much as the express companies pay the railways for their kind of service. The average charge per pound of the express companies is 1½ (1.56) cents per pound for the average haul of their matter; and since under the various parcels-post schemes the Government would have to pay the railways from 30 per cent to 90 per cent more than the whole express rate to the shipper for that part of the expense alone, it is obvious that it would, under such schemes, have to charge the public rates about twice as high as the express rates now complained of.

APPENDIX G.

OPERATING CONTRACTS AND PRACTICES.

The contract between an express company and a railway company usually provides that the express company shall have the exclusive right to operate upon lines named in the contract for a definite term of years; that all matter carried upon passenger trains except personal baggage, corpses, milk cans, dogs, and certain other commodities shall be turned over by the railway company to the express company (the contract in one case going so far as to state that all packages or freight carried upon any train at passenger-train speed are to be considered express matter and turned over by the railway company to the express company); that the railway company shall transport to and from all points on its lines all express matter in charge of the express company; that special or exclusive express trains shall be provided by the railway company when warranted by the volume of express traffic; that the railway company shall furnish the necessary cars, keep them in good repair, furnish heat and light, and carry the messengers of the express company, as well as the safes, packing trunks, and all necessary equipment; and that horses, wagons, and supplies required by the express company may either be transported in express cars or be shipped by freight.

The contract further provides that the officers and employees of the express company, when traveling upon the business of the company, shall be carried free by the railway; that the railway company shall furnish such room in all its depots, stations, and buildings as may be necessary for the loading, unloading, transferring, and storage of express matter, provided the furnishing of such facilities shall not interfere with the business of the railway company; that the express company may employ during the pleasure of the railway company any of the agents of the latter as the agents of the express company, and may employ the train baggagemen as its messengers, provided that such employment shall not interfere with the duties of the employees to the railway company, but the express company alone is liable for the misconduct of such agents in respect to its express business when so employed. The express company, in respect to all matter carried free of charge for the railway company, is not liable for any loss or damage occasioned by accidents to trains, or by fraud or theft, or by casualties of any kind. The railway company further agrees to transmit free of charge the messages of the express company over telegraph lines which the railway company operates along its lines of road so far as it may be permitted to do so under its contracts with telegraph companies.

The express company, on its part, agrees to pay a fixed per cent of its gross receipts from handling express matter (with the larger railway companies generally a minimum payment is guaranteed); to charge no rate at less than an agreed per cent of the freight rates on the same commodity (usually 150 per cent); to handle, free of charge, money, bonds, valuables, and ordinary express matter of the railway company; to indemnify the railway company for any damages sustained in consequence of the death of or injury to any employee of the express company; to assume sole responsibility for loss of or damage to the express matter in its custody other than the express matter of the railway company carried free of charge; and to pay to the railway company an agreed proportion of the salaries or wages of such employees of the railway company as render services to the express company. The railway company has the right to examine the books, records, and accounts of the express company so far as they relate to the business done under the contract, and may require reasonable safeguards and checks for the purpose of securing correctness in accounting to it for the business done over its lines.

Under some of the contracts the express company agrees not to operate over a competing line of road, and in one contract examined it was found that the railway company required that the express company "shall not fix its rates for transportation and other services connected with the express business via the railroads of the railroad company at any less than the rates fixed by other express carriers between the same points, except that in case of disability or deficiency of routes via the railroads of the railroad company by reason of greater distance, longer time in transit," or other reasons to the prejudice of the routes via the lines of the railway company, the express company has the right to make a sufficient reduction in the rate to retain a proper share of the competitive traffic.

In small towns it is customary for the railway agent to act as the express agent also, being paid by the express company an agreed percentage of the revenue from business done. Generally speaking, the commission allowed such agents is 10 per cent on both inbound and outbound business and a commission of one-third the charges on money-order sales. The amounts paid by express companies are taken into consideration by the railway companies in fixing the salaries of station agents, and the salaries paid by the railway companies are adjusted accordingly.

On many roads the express messengers act as train baggagemen, in which case their salaries are divided between the companies concerned on an agreed basis.

The express company keeps the accounts between itself and the railway company and settles with the railway company on the basis of the amount shown in its accounts. The revenue earned on a given line of road when a shipment is carried over two or more lines is arrived at by the use of a mileage prorate or of a rate prorate. Where the rate prorate is used, the local rates per 100 pounds from point of origin to the junction point and from the junction point to destination are ascertained, and either line's proportion of the revenue from a through shipment at a through rate is determined by dividing the revenue in the ratio of the local rates.

The amount of revenue accruing on a given line having been determined by an express company, the amount due the railway company is computed by applying the percentages agreed upon in the contract. With some of the smaller railway companies, electric lines, and steamboat lines there is still used the tonnage basis of contract—that is, an agreed rate per 100 pounds—but, generally speaking, the percentage basis is the one used.

The interest of the public in the percentage contract lies in the fact that an increase in the compensation received by the express company carries with it a relative increase to the other party.

There is slight need for textual comment on the information presented in the above summary. Every item is significant for one who desires to gain an adequate conception of the scope and character of the express business. Though the aggregates would vary for the several months and for the same month from year to year, the averages and percentages may be accepted as fairly portraying the traffic conditions under which express companies operate. It is significant to observe that 95.01 per cent of the number of pieces handled, 74.06 per cent of the weight, and 83.69 per cent of the accruing revenue pertain to express matter of 100 pounds or less. It is further significant to learn that of this class of traffic the average weight per piece is 25.57 pounds, and the average revenue per pound is 1.74 cents. It is proposed to test the accuracy of these averages from time to time by the selection of other months than those named, although there is little likelihood that a compilation for all the months of the year would seriously affect the averages here disclosed, or that future tests will modify them in any marked degree. These averages may be used with reasonable confidence as long as express companies operate under present traffic, tariff, and contractual conditions.

APPENDIX U.

THE PARCELS-POST SYSTEM OF GERMANY.

[Written for Dun's Review of Feb. 24, 1906, by Hon. J. C. Monaghan, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C.]

Among the greatest needs of the present day is a better development of the means of distribution. Much of the overproduction, of which so many complaints are heard, is simply due to lack of distribution. Among the modern methods of distributing merchandise the post holds a rank scarcely dreamed of in the days of the first American Postmaster General, Benjamin Franklin. Even his genius hardly foresaw the day when the packages of the merchant and tradesman would be carried by the postman. The best example of a successful parcels-post system to enable a business man to form a just idea of it is the German system, which the writer saw in operation for 12 years. The gigantic genius that forged and welded the fragments of the empire into one cohesive mass—Bismarck—did as much as anyone to give the Empire a postal system so successful that it excites envy and emulation. In the year 1903 it netted the Empire nearly $15,000,000 over and above all expenditures, while the American service showed a deficit of $4,356,000.

Not the least successful branch of the system—certainly not the least useful part—is that which deals with parcels or packages of all kinds of products, from those of the farm or ranch to those of the factory or department store. From the huge streams of wares that flow through the post offices of Berlin, Hamburg, and the larger towns and cities, as well as the tiny rivulets of articles that are put into the parcels post in remote Tyrolese hamlets and in thousands of country offices, is formed a veritable ocean or sea of traffic. The yellow wagons of the Empire or the royal wagons of Kingdoms like Wurtemburg and Bavaria that have held on to their separate postal rights, wind their way in and out of the highways and byways of the entire empire, picking up and laying down wares. Anyone may participate in the benefits of the German parcels-post system—that is, anyone who is willing to conform to its regulations regarding fulminates, living creatures, the making out of cards, etc. A mother in the south may make up a parcel or package of food, linen, and other articles and send it to her boy in Berlin for a trifling sum. A traveler may pick up bits of bric-a-brac in the hills and have them mailed to some central city for a few cents, or he may leave his linen to be washed and have it forwarded to some place on his itinerary for no more than he would expect to pay a porter to carry it to his hotel. Nor has the housewife any inconvenience; the yellow wagon with its royal eagles will call to pick up the parcels as well as to deliver them, charging nothing for calling and only a trifle for the collecting.

A card about 4 by 6 inches has to accompany every package. In case of goods going to one address, three packages, unless insured, registered, or sent c. o. d., may be covered by one card. This indicates the disposition of the country to make the postal service not only convenient, but as inexpensive as possible. When insured, registered, or sent c. o. d., each package must have its own card. Every card is divided into two parts. On the extreme left is a strip for the address of the sender, the stamp of the receiving office, and for the name of the party to whom the goods are sent. This part is torn from the card and is retained at the receiving office and constitutes an excellent reference record in case of loss or trouble. On the other part is put the name of the person for whom the goods are intended, the stamp or stamps necessary to send it, a space for the number of packages sent, the weight of the package as determined by the post-office scales, and a number corresponding with one marked upon the package itself and given serially. On the back of the card are spaces for a short message to the receiver, for a storage number to be used in case the package has to be laid away till called for, or for instructions in regard to delivery; also space for the signature of the receiver. Besides all this there are printed instructions as to how the card is to be used and certain important points in the parcels-post regulations. These cards cost the price of the stamp on them when stamped, or four for 1 cent, unstamped. Private parties may make and use their own cards provided they supply themselves with exact imitations of those furnished by the Government.

The package has to correspond in every particular of its address to the form used on the card. It must indicate by the word "frei," or "franco," corresponding to our word free, that postage has been paid, or that it is "eingeschrieben," registered, or "per Eilbote zu bestellen," to be delivered by special messenger, etc. In case the package, as frequently happens, contains animals, living or dead, or any perishable commodity, the card must contain instructions to "return to ——— if not delivered," or "if not delivered, sell," or "if not delivered, telegraph sender." And "the beauty of it all," as a traveling American once put it, "is that the Imperial Government does exactly as it is told or asked to do." The address must be written in full; must be perfectly plain, both as to names and numbers. In case a consignment is insured, that fact must be put upon the package as well as upon the card. Light objects of little value, such as can stand pressure and which will not cause dirt or any kind of inconvenience, may be put up in ordinary packing paper. All parcels above 6 pounds must be put up in several wrappings of heavy paper. Valuable parcels, particularly those that are easily moistened, crushed, or injured by rubbing, must be covered with oilcloth or pasteboard, or must be packed in boxes; in other words, care must be taken to so cover them as to secure a minimum of danger. Fluids shipped in bottles or flasks must be carefully packed in cases or baskets. Living creatures must be so packed as to protect the animal from discomfort, at least reasonably so, and to make sure of no injury or danger of injury to the post-office officials or parties whose duty it is to handle the packages. The wrapping, tying, sealing, etc., of the packages must be such as to secure its contents from unwarranted examination. Packages that are insured must be carefully sealed with sealing wax and legibly stamped. If the parcel or package is one that is sent in a locked box, case, or cask, the sealing is not, as in the other cases, indispensable. Coin, paper money, bonds, and other valuable paper may be sent by the parcels post, but they are sent under special regulations.

The only regulation in the system to which any exception can be taken is the one that says the parcels must be forwarded by the accommodation trains, and not by the limited or fast ones. This is doubtless due to the fact that delivery of so many packages would inevitably and inordinately delay the fast trains. Exception, however, might have been made in favor of live animals, fresh fish, perishable fruits, and flowers, for in all of these there is an immense traffic. Perhaps it is pertinent to remark here that the payment of $0.338 will secure the shipment of such parcels on fast trains and special delivery at point of destination. Shipments of an urgent character, if marked as such, may not be registered or insured. They must, however, bear the word urgent ("dringlich") in large letters on a card of a particular color, the address being clear and unmistakable. In ordinary towns parcels are delivered twice a day; in large cities oftener. In case the card calls for a special delivery the package is hurried to its destination by a special messenger. This service calls for 10 cents extra if the delivery is inside city limits and 22 cents if it is beyond them. In some cases notice only of the arrival of the package is given by special messenger, in which case the charge is the same as for the special delivery of ordinary letters or money orders—5 cents inside the city, 15 cents outside. If the sender pays for the special messenger he must indicate that he has done so by putting "Bote bezahlt" (messenger paid) on the parcel and accompanying card. In case no special delivery is demanded or possible, the package is delivered in the ordinary way by the regular parcels-post wagon.

The delivery charge differs in degree, depending upon distance. For example, parcels up to 11 pounds pay 2½ cents inside city limits; for rural delivery the charge is 2½ cents for packages under 5½ pounds, and 5 cents for all others that are within the weight permitted for parcels. Heavier parcels—that is, parcels of more than 5 pounds—for city delivery pay 3½ cents per parcel. In case the card covers three packages, the limit allowed to one card, there is a charge of 3½ cents for the heaviest and 1½ cents for each of the other two. When the goods have to be carried into the country (rural delivery) the charge is 2½ cents for each parcel weighing less than 5½ pounds, and 5 cents for every other parcel permitted to go by parcels post. Careful, sensible, systematic, and businesslike are the only words that will properly describe this wonderful system and its successful work. In the matter of city delivery fees much is left to local authorities; the general-delivery fees, however, are determined by the central postal authorities. A very large part of the postal parcels are carried to the post office by boys and girls, private messengers, servants, and by the parties sending the wares. As already indicated, the parcels-post wagon is always ready to call. It has its regular rounds each day, and may be called by a card addressed to the bureau or division having charge of the wagons. Of course, such a card should be sent to reach headquarters before the wagons start on their daily trips. A parcel may be carried to a wagon long after it has passed the locality in which the sender resides. It will be taken by the conductor of the wagon, for each wagon has a conductor and driver. The charge for collection is the same as the charge for delivery, 2½ cents inside the city limits and 3½ cents for collections in the country, or outside city limits, in the so-called rural zones, for parcels weighing less than 5½ pounds, and 6½ cents for heavier parcels up to the limit allowed by law. In case the carrier can not deliver a parcel the sender is notified and asked for instructions, a charge of 5 cents being made for the notice. As already pointed out, if a sender has doubts about the acceptance or ability of the carrier to deliver, he can make provision for its delivery or disposition on the accompanying card.

The one vital factor in a system of this kind is the charge. If it is too high it defeats the object at which it aims—public convenience. In all its efforts to secure efficiency the German Empire has always aimed at a system such as would secure that result at a moderate cost. Its success has been fairly phenomenal, for its charges have been moderate, the service the very acme of efficiency. As already suggested, distance and weight form the factors in the problem of price for the service. The distance charges are determined by zones, the first zone or circle within which the lowest price is paid being 10 geographical miles from the post office as a center; the second zone all points beyond the 10-mile limit, but within 20 miles; the third, the points between the 20 and a 50-mile circle; the fourth, between 50 and 100; the fifth, between 100 and 150; the sixth and last, all points in the Empire beyond a circle 150 miles from the post office or center. For lighter parcels, those weighing less than 11 pounds, only two zones are marked off, the 10-mile zone and those parts of the Empire beyond the 10-mile boundary. For such parcels the charge is 6 cents for the inside and 12 cents for the outside zones; for parcels weighing over 11 pounds an extra charge is made upon every extra 2.2 pounds or kilogram. The packages are weighed before admission, and are accepted up to 110 pounds each. In case the sender fails to prepay the postal charges, a fine of 2½ cents is levied on parcels that do not weigh more than 11 pounds; in case of heavier packages no fine is levied. The purpose of this regulation is to effectively reduce the number of unpaid parcels under 11 pounds, for these make up the major part of the parcels posted. Light packages, but of large size—say, cases containing bonnets, flowers, feathers, etc., or delicate, easily destroyed commodities—come under a specific classification. They are classed by cubic contents. As soon as a package exceeds 59 inches in any one dimension it is put in this class; also, parcels that measure 39.37 inches one way and 19.68 in another, but weigh less than 22 pounds. In this class fall plants in baskets sent all over the Empire by nurseries, hat and bonnet boxes, furniture, fancy baskets, boxes, Black Forest or Tyrol clocks and carvings, cages, empty or containing animals, etc. Such parcels pay 50 per cent more than the regular rates, insurance fees not included in the estimate. Parcels of great value are usually insured, the charges being exceedingly small, 2½ cents for all parcels under $142.80, with 1.19 cents additional for each $71.40; in other words, a parcel worth $357 pays, when insured, for such insurance 5.95 cents, practically 6 cents; a parcel worth $1,428 is insured for 23.8 cents, etc.

How much the parcels post has meant in the past, how much it means now, and how much it is to mean in the empire's marvelous development will never be known till some German Mulhall makes its work the subject of a brilliant special monograph. From the far-off shores of Heligoland and the North Sea fishing villages the products of the deep are collected, carried across a large part of the Continent, and delivered, the service extending to the confines of Bohemia or even to Austria and Hungary, for there is a postal arrangement between the two empires that admits all the benefits of the one to the citizens of the other. From the seaport cities come the bananas, oranges, lemons, pineapples, coconuts, the rich spices of the East, the finer fibers and textiles of Persia, India, China, and Japan; from Switzerland come the rich dairy products and marvelous honey gathered from its mountain flowers, a honey as rich as that of Hymettus; from the Rhine lands the wines are sent in baskets far beyond where the vine will grow; out of the south, by Botzen, on the hills near Innsbruck, and along Lake Garda go fruits and flowers to Berlin and Breslau, Konigsberg, Danzig, and Stettin. A message by wire, in case of a run on fruits or flowers, will be filled in 24 or 48 hours, the entire order, including the telegram, costing from 25 cents to $1, the latter price being exceptional, incurred only when the parcel exceeds 50 pounds. Under the 11-pound policy for 12 cents enormous shipments have been made and are being made. This rate is the popular one.

Business men, bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and the people are unanimous in praise of the imperial parcels post. All regard it as indispensable. All wonder how they ever got along without it. The rates from the empire to neighboring nations, particularly to those with whom Germany has arranged postal treaties, are exceedingly low. As already indicated, the rates to Austria are the same as those laid down by law for Germany, and parcels for Egypt and through Switzerland and Italy pay only 52 cents for 11 pounds. Parcels for the United States cost 33 cents if 1 kilogram or 2.2 pounds; from 2.2 to 11 pounds, 33 to 88 cents, depending upon weight, distance, delivery, etc. In all cases care must be taken first to find out the terms of the law. This may be done by reading the rules and regulations. Certain requirements are exacted in the case of goods going into a country that exacts tariff duties. In the case of our own country, the law requires the making out of two declarations, covering the cost in addition to the card. In the matter of size, no package must be over 41.24 inches or 105 centimeters long, and the circumference must not go beyond 70.87 inches (180 centimeters). The charge for packages ranging from 1 kilogram (2.2 pounds) to 4.4 pounds is 26 cents; for each 22.046 pounds or fraction thereof an additional charge of 13 cents is made. The rate for 220.46 pounds (100 kilograms) is $1.31. As regards the imperial parcels-post system as a whole, Germany's method of meeting the new economic, industrial, and commercial era upon which it has entered is one that is sure to commend itself in time to the thoughtful statesman.

Australia, Belgium, and Germany, at least, among these have the 110-pound limit; a limit within which 96 per cent of the American express traffic travels, the average parcel weighing 32.80 pounds, and only about 5 per cent (4.94) of the number of pieces exceeding 100 pounds.

As perhaps the most elaborate and best tested, if not the most excellent, example of the conception, the German system is referred to; and a most readable as well as reliable description of it, by Hon. J. C. Monaghan, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, is given.

APPENDIX W.

AN AGRICULTURAL PARCEL POST.

[Nineteenth Century, vol. 53, p. 253.]

The object of the writer of this article is not so much to entertain the reader as to attempt to show how the income of the United Kingdom may be immediately increased by at least 60,000,000 sterling, distributed among a class of men who are admitted to be the backbone of the community, but whose fate it seems to be to suffer from the prosperity of their fellows. There is but one class which can be thus described—the agricultural. There is but one remedy suggested for its misfortunes—an agricultural parcel post.

Not that the post office can do all that is required. The official Hercules will certainly expect the depressed cultivator to put a shoulder to the wheel. The postmaster general is nowise responsible for the enterprise of trans-Atlantic farmers or the cutting of trans-Atlantic freights. So long as the British farmer acts on the theory that his land will produce only one thing, which he can not sell at a profit, nobody, not even Hercules, can help him. For, as against stupidity, "the gods themselves contend in vain." But if he will grow that which is highly profitable, and which the post office alone (without injury to its revenue) can bring to market, then it is clearly the duty of the post office to place its machinery at his service. It is worth while to examine with an impartial mind the facts and arguments for and against postal intervention.

WHAT WE ARE LOSING—IN ACRES.

There are in the United Kingdom 77,667,959 acres, of which 29,917,374 acres are uncultivated. Of the uncultivated portion, 1,225,000 acres were cultivated 11 years ago, when I brought the matter before Mr. Raikes; 806,872 have been laid down in pasture, while 418,473 have become primeval deserts.

WHAT WE ARE LOSING—IN MEN.

While our fields have been thus abandoned to weeds those who tilled them have emigrated to lands where their services are valuable. In the last 10 years 1,603,523 persons have left our shores, whole villages have been deserted as in time of plague, and all we get in return for our country is the barren title, officina gentium.

NO LINK BETWEEN GROWER AND BUYER.

The sterilizing influence, the fatal objection, is the want of some means of getting the produce in question quickly and cheaply to the market. A man farming 1,000 acres contracts with the dealers in town and delivers his produce daily from his own van or cart at the nearest railway station. But the tens of thousands who occupy from 1 to 20 acres own no vans, and in order to secure lower rent they live far away from the railways. And the situation of a farm is everything. We can not say of the modern British farmer as Horace wrote of the Roman, "Beatus ille qui procul negotiis."

THE DRUGGIST CALLED IN.

When dealing with "perishables" produce, as it is called, it is obvious that speed of transmission from grower to consumer is the vital factor. No sooner has the apple fallen or the egg been laid or the butter been made than predatory bacteria begin to pollute it and destroy its pristine and peculiar savor. A certain Scottish angler and epicure has a fire kindled on the bank of the Tweed and into a pot boiling on that fire the first salmon he kills is thrown. Another salmon, caught within the hour and cooked in London 24 hours later, would have a different and inferior flavor, because the oil in the flesh would be slightly rancid. Thompson, the poet, ate peaches growing on the tree just as writers of prose, if bold enough, the oyster alive. Dr. Johnson, who, doubtless, in those days of bad roads and slow wagons, spoke feelingly, declared that no man was "satisfied with a moderately fresh egg." If we except Chinamen, this is true; but very few inhabitants of our towns can secure "new-laid" eggs. As to butter, cheese, and milk, it is notorious that our foreign friends thoughtfully save our noses from being offended by a liberal use of chemical preservatives, with which the British stomach is supposed to deal. One dares not calculate how many kegs of Belgian borax and French acid the British middle-class baby must assimilate at the most critical period of its existence.

A DETAILED PLAN.

It remains to suggest a workable plan for the desired operation of the post office. And here it becomes an outsider who is not an official and who knows nothing experimentally of la petite culture to observe all due modesty. The aim in this article is to promote discussion of the subject; and it will, of course, be a subject of congratulation to the writer if a far better system than his can be brought forward.

THE PRIME NEED.

In the first place, the post office should undertake the work of collection. In every rural district mapped out there should be local depots, say a mile apart, along the roads to which parcels of produce would be brought by a certain hour from the neighboring farms and cottages. A postal van hired in the locality would collect from these depots and the village post offices and convey the parcels to the nearest railway station. The trifling expense of maintaining such a depot might fairly be undertaken by the farmers benefited.

Motor cars should be employed if possible. Let us suppose that a district is 10 miles from a post office and is inhabited by a hundred cottagers raising then (as all would) produce. Clearly the rural postman who now accepts parcels would (even if trained by Sandow) be unequal to the task. But the postal van or motor car would convey everything to the station in time for the appointed train to the town of destination. On reaching that town the parcels would be delivered (if so addressed) to the depot to be established there or (if so addressed) to individual purchasers. In this way eggs, milk, butter, poultry, fruit, and flowers might be placed on our tables within four or five hours of the leaving of the farm of origin.

RATES.

And now with respect to rates. The writer would recommend 1 penny per pound for the cash-on-deliver parcels, with a minimum of 2 pence for anything not over 2 pounds, and one-half penny per pound with a penny minimum for parcels consigned to depots where the postal work is simply collection. These charges should be paid in adhesive stamps.

The maximum weight should be raised to one hundredweight (as in Germany), to be ultimately higher still. And here one should entreat the post office to have as few charges as possible and to give the "zone" system, so successful on the Continent, at least a fair trial. Unfortunately, the post office, as we know, has to pay 50 per cent of the postage on railway-borne parcels to the companies. That bargain, however, comes to an end next year, and meanwhile the post office would pocket all the postage on the parcels sent to the nearest depot by its motor-car service.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 25, 1911.

Hon. D. J. LEWIS, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request of the 20th instant for information with reference to City and Rural Delivery Services, I beg to advise you as follows:

At the present time there are 1,528 post offices having city delivery. The letter carriers in these offices serve a population of approximately 43,000,000.

The law requires that before city delivery can be established at an office the gross postal receipts must amount to $10,000 or more, or the population, according to the last Federal or State census, must be 10,000 or more. If either of these requirements is met, city delivery may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be authorized. No rule prescribing a minimum population has been made, but at the average office, where the receipts are sufficient to permit the establishment of the service, the population is usually between 3,000 and 4,000, and the employment of two or more carriers is generally necessary. Even where the requirement is met as to receipts, however, the service would not ordinarily be established unless the full time of one carrier could be utilized. As a precedent to the establishment of the City Delivery Service the department also requires the streets to be named, houses numbered, sidewalks laid, and adequate street lights provided.

On May 1, 1911, there were in operation from 17,295 post offices 41,289 rural routes, served by 41,190 rural carriers. Approximately 20,000,000 people are served by these carriers.

Very truly, yours,

FRANK H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General.

APPENDIX Z.

THE SOCIOLOGICAL VIEW.

[Ward, Dynamic Sociology, vol. 2, p. 578.]

As remarked in the Introduction, the question whether any enterprise should be undertaken by the State or left to private individuals is one which must be determined on the intrinsic merits of each individual case. The transfer of functions from the latter to the former simply marks the expansion of the jurisdiction of the State, a process which, when correctly viewed, has been going on steadily from the earliest ages of political history. Nearly every present acknowledged function of government has once been intrusted to private enterprise. It simply shows that little by little society has risen to the consciousness of its needs, and has, one by one, assumed control of the more important public interests. Whether it be its finances, its criminal jurisprudence, its customs regulation, its postal affairs, its telegraphs, or its railroads, whatever it fairly perceives to need State administration, it proceeds to assume and add to the functions of the government.

Now, of all the enterprises which the State has thus appropriated to itself there is not one which it has not managed better and more wisely than it had been managed before by private parties. Most of them are such that the world has entirely forgotten that they were ever private enterprises. Others have become cherished public institutions, which no future revolutions can again remand to private direction. And there are others which are still debating ground and on trial in some States. The transportation question is one of these latter. Telegraph communication is another. Education is a third. Other social operations still, not now looked upon except by a few as belonging to this class, are destined to pass through the stages of agitation and governmental assumption. These facts should not, however, lead to the conclusion that government should immediately assume charge of all private enterprises which concern the general public. There must be a gradual maturing of the conditions, both on the side of the State and the individual, before this can successfully be done. The question in each case must always be, Is the age ripe for this change? As society is constituted, however, premature action of this nature can scarcely occur. So strong is the force of established custom that it much more frequently happens that the event is too long postponed and the State does not step in until the crying evils of private mismanagement and individual incompetency have thoroughly aroused it to the necessity.

The superiority of governmental administration over private management in large enterprises of a general private character has been clearly seen and frequently pointed out, but the progress of popular opinion on such questions has been powerfully counteracted by the special nature of the case. Private enterprise is ever jealous of governmental encroachment upon its domain, and the more lucrative the enterprise is—that is, the greater the need that it be conducted by society in the interest of its members—the stronger will be the influence brought to bear against such a result. This influence is exerted by the creation of a public sentiment against state interference. In this private enterprise always has matters almost entirely its own way. The State has little interest in the subject. The people at large rarely attribute their burdens to the proper source. Things must reach the point of unendurableness before the public will appeal to the State for assistance. Meanwhile a constant stream of opposition to all forms of State interference, more or less ingeniously supported by plausible argument, is being poured out by interested parties. The result is, according to the principle already laid down, that current views which are unopposed will be generally accepted (Supra, 422, 433), that the State must overcome an immense mass of prejudice before it can act in any case. It is fashionable to declaim against the so-called "bureaucracy" of modern times, but this is only a part of the attempt of sagacious capitalists to manufacture public sentiment to counteract the steady current of rational conviction toward the conclusion that society must arouse to its own interests and take the welfare of its members more directly into its own hands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, before yielding to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] I desire to be indulged for a moment to make a statement. On yesterday the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] called my attention to the fact that on page 5 of the report on the bill under consideration the statement was contained reading—

As is well known, the Republican tariff legislation of 1909 was an honest revision in the public interest.

When the corrected proof sheets went to the Public Printer, as shown by the record in his hands now, that sentence read:

As is well known, the Republican tariff legislation of 1909 was not an honest revision in the public interest.

In some way, I know not how, after the corrected proof sheets went to the Public Printer that word "not" was dropped out. The Public Printer has reprinted the document so as to make it conform to the proof sheets, and the copies of the report that were here on yesterday, of course, are incorrect in that respect.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman was right, even for a moment, although he changes it this morning and makes a wrong statement.

Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill before us is a bill entitled "To reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool." In presenting this bill to the House and to the country the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], leaves no doubt as to the policy which the Democratic Party proposes to pursue while it is in control of this House, or would propose to pursue if placed in control of the country. The distinguished gentleman from Alabama yesterday boldly and candidly avowed that in the preparation of the bill he gave no consideration to the interests of the producers of wool or to the interests of the manufacturers of wool. He boldly avowed that the bill was made wholly with a view to the production of revenue, without any regard to the interests of those in this country engaged either in the production of wool or woolen goods. And this declaration was one which met with approval, apparently unanimous, on the Democratic side of the House.

The speech of the gentleman from Alabama has not yet been printed in the RECORD, very naturally being held out over to-day for the purpose of proper revision and addition in the way of figures and statistics; but there has been printed in the RECORD the speech which the distinguished gentleman delivered in this House on the so-called farmers' free-list bill. In that speech the gentleman from Alabama stated:

Now, I do not propose to discuss this question from the standpoint of a protectionist, because I am not a protectionist, and neither is my party composed of protectionists.

Further, he said:

We do not believe in levying taxes at the customhouse for the benefit of any man or the benefit of any industry. Our position is that the taxes levied at the customhouse are for the sole purpose of producing revenue to support the Government of the United States, and that we are not justified in levying taxes for any other purpose. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Therefore, when we approach the question of putting articles on the free list, the sole point involved, so far as we are concerned, is whether the Government of the United States can dispense with the revenue derived from these articles.

Again he said:

But if you will lower your rates of duty to a point where reasonable and fair competition is arrived at, more goods will come into the country, and consequently more revenue will be collected at the customhouses.

In presenting these schedules of the tariff bill to the House for consideration, we believe that by reason of a fair reduction in the tariff rates in the present schedules we will, instead of reducing, actually increase the revenue at the customhouses.

And again he said:

Now, our clear duty is to reduce the tariff on articles on which the present rates are prohibitive, and to increase the quantity of imports to a reasonable extent, and thereby increase the amount of revenue from the customs.

And again he said:

The difference between a free list made by you—

referring to the Republican side of the House—and one made by us, is that you have always been in favor of making such a list either on articles that were noncompetitive in the American market and did not interfere with any manufacturing enterprise in the United States, or by putting articles on the free list to favor the American manufacturer.

Those statements, made before, were reiterated by the gentleman yesterday. They have been amplified by other gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE], a new Member of the House, said, followed by applause on the Democratic side of the House, in his speech on April 18:

I look not only for the time, and I hope it may come speedily, when there shall be no tariff whatsoever north of us, but I look to see no tariff south of us, no tariff east of us, no tariff west of us, but perfect freedom of trade with all the world.

And the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL] on April 28 said in a speech on the floor of this House:

Levy no tax save for revenue only.

And the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] said in a speech published on the 29th of April:

The Democratic Party has stood for a hundred years for a tariff for revenue only. It has seen parties and "isms" founded upon unscientific economic theories come and go, and it continues to advocate with popular favor those essential principles announced by its founder.

And the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] said in a speech published on May 2:

The Democratic Party, on the other hand, stands for a tariff for revenue only, this policy being determined in the councils of the party and declared in its platforms. It stands for a tariff for revenue as against the policy of the Republican Party of a tariff for protection with incidental revenue.

And the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], long a Member of this House and long the chairman of the Democratic caucus, in a speech published on May 4 said:

The difference between the two parties is that the Democrats assert that the Government ought to levy duties primarily for the sole purpose of raising public revenue, and that this is the only rightful use of the power of taxation.

And the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] said in a speech published on May 5:

I do not believe in exercising the power of the General Government to levy taxes upon the people except for revenue. * * * I would not levy a dollar for protection.

And the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], logical as he is, a distinguished Member on that side of the House, a member of the Committee on Rules, now placed at the head of a great investigating committee, having the confidence of that side of the House, following the logic to its ultimate end of the statements made by the other gentlemen, said in a speech published on May 3:

Let us abandon this system of imposing duties on competitive articles and obtain our revenue entirely from noncompetitive articles, the sole exception being in the case of luxuries.

My construction of the time-worn battle cry of our party, "A tariff for revenue only," may not be the conventional one, but it is, I believe, the one that sound statesmanship suggests. As I interpret that phrase "only" is not an adverb of purpose, but is an adverb of effect, and duties should be laid not only for the sole purpose of obtaining revenue, but so as to have no other effect except to raise revenue.

On this side of the House we stand for that principle which leads to the encouragement and the development of industries in our own country, as against such industries in foreign countries. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We believe that it is better to make our goods and buy them from ourselves than it is to send our money abroad and buy them when made by foreign labor, as you would propose. [Applause on the Republican side.] You believe in raising revenue on noncompetitive articles; we believe in raising revenue on competitive articles. [Applause on the Republican side.] If you carry your logic to effect, as the gentleman from Georgia would, you will raise large revenue on those article which can not be produced in the United States. We propose to raise revenue at the customhouses on articles which can be produced in the United States, so as to help the manufacturing and the labor employed in it at home rather than abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I come to the discussion of this bill with some embarrassment. I do not claim to have that full information which I would like to possess if I were authorized myself to prepare a bill for presentation to the House. I am not wholly satisfied with the provisions in the existing law, but that state of mind is possibly based rather upon popular prejudice and ignorance than it is upon facts. I would not wish, if I could help it, to be compelled to pass upon the merits of the existing law without more complete knowledge than I have or I believe the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the aisle have. But I noticed yesterday that the distinguished gentleman from Alabama assumed that in preparing this bill he had information galore, more information than could be presented to him to advantage by a tariff board appointed for the purpose and now engaged in actually collecting information which would have a bearing upon this subject.

The distinguished gentleman from Alabama stated that they did not need to wait for information from the Tariff Board, assuming that they have ample information with which to decide this most intricate subject of tariff legislation, the woolen schedule. He gave as one of the reasons for the passage of this bill the condition of the finances of the country, and seriously read to the House a statement from the daily Treasury statement as justifying the provisions in this bill.

The distinguished gentleman from Alabama is a gentleman for whom I have the highest regard. I believe him to be as competent and capable as any man on the Democratic side, if I would not even place him at the top of the list. When he says that he needs no more information than he possesses in order to prepare a tariff bill and gives as one of the special reasons for the provisions in this bill the figures which he reads from the daily Treasury statement, we wonder whether his figures and his deductions are correct in that respect.

The gentleman from Alabama yesterday did not go into the details of figures to any great extent, but when it came to the question of the revenue and the amount of money to be collected by this Government for this fiscal year the gentleman was very bold and explained to us the basis of the bill; that the bill was prepared to meet conditions shown by the daily Treasury statement.

What was his statement? Holding in his hand the daily Treasury statement of receipts and disbursements under the date of June 5, 1911, showing the condition of the Treasury at the close of business June 5, 1911, he read from page 2, column 4, at the top of the page, that the total ordinary receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30 next would be, as estimated by the Treasury Department, for the entire year, $625,071,413.90. In vain did the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] endeavor to furnish information to the gentleman from Alabama. The gentleman from Alabama, with that cocksureness which has led him to propose to the House this woolen-schedule bill, decried the efforts of the gentleman from New York and others to give him information in reference to the daily Treasury statement.

What are the facts of the case? The gentleman from Alabama prepared a bill, as he says, based on the statement which he made to the House, that the total ordinary receipts of the Government for this fiscal year up to June 30 is estimated to be $625,000,000, while last year, as he stated, the receipts were $675,000,000, and hence, under the Payne law, this year the receipts would be $50,000,000 less than last year. He stated that he took his information from the statement issued by the Treasury Department in a Republican administration. The gentleman read from the column which is headed "This fiscal year ending June 30, 1911."

On that same page, following the item of ordinary receipts and disbursements, there is a column giving the receipts for this day, another column giving the receipts for this month, another column giving the receipts for this month of the last fiscal year, another column giving the receipts for this fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, another column giving the receipts to this date of the last fiscal year. It is to me the most surprising thing that I have witnessed since I have been a Member of this House—more than 14 years—that the distinguished gentleman, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, whose duty it is to provide legislation to raise revenue for the support of the Government, that this distinguished gentleman had never before, apparently, seen the daily statement of the Treasury Department showing the condition of the finances and did not understand what it means. [Applause on the Republican side.] Think of it. [Applause on the Republican side.] A chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means who does not know what the daily Treasury statement means, who can not read it intelligently or intelligibly! Now, everyone else than Members on that side of the House knows that that statement shows the receipts up to the end of that day, in this June 5 column, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911. That is what it says.

On the first of last July the Treasury Department issued a Treasury statement in form like this, with the same heading, in which it gave the receipts for the fiscal year up to the end of the first day of July, and on every day since it published a statement giving the receipts up to the end of the day for this fiscal year. That is what it did in this statement. The gentleman said that the statement showed that the estimated receipts under the Payne law for the entire fiscal year were $625,000,000. How lucky it was for him that he did not happen to get the statement of the day before, because if he had gotten the statement of the day before he would have found that the receipts for the fiscal year were to be $623,959,000; and if he had gotten the statement for June 2 he would have discovered that the receipts for the entire fiscal year were only to be $619,000,000 instead of $625,000,000.

If he had gotten the statement for June 1 he would have discovered that the receipts for the entire year were to be only $617,000,000, and yet this gentleman prepared a bill and presented it to the House as a revenue measure, not understanding either the receipts of the Government or the common daily statement of the Treasury Department. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman read a statement of June 5. If his speech had been a day delayed he would have read the statement of June 6. Yesterday he stated that the estimated receipts were $625,000,000 for the entire fiscal year, but if he had waited until to-day he would have stated that the estimated receipts were $627,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the basis of this bill. That is the basis upon which the gentleman from Alabama stated they have knowledge enough to prepare a woolen schedule bill—that they do not need the knowledge for the Tariff Board. He said, in effect: "We require no further investigation of the subject; we know." Now, Mr. Chairman, it is proper to state in this connection that the very statement which the gentleman yesterday held in his hand, by which he was endeavoring to prove, by his lack of knowledge of the statement, that the receipts would fall short $50,000,000 from what the receipts were last year—that very statement shows that the receipts up to that date were more than $21,000,000 greater than they were last year, and that the receipts were over $9,000,000 this year up to date in excess of the expenditures. [Applause on the Republican side.] But I presume that the gentleman did not understand those figures.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion——

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). Not for his benefit, but for the benefit of the gentleman from Alabama. If he should take, now, the statement of June 6 he would find that the additional sum making up the $627,000,000 was just exactly the statement of the receipts for yesterday. Now, I only wanted to get the A B C of the matter of the statement before the gentleman from Alabama and before some of the intelligent Members on that side of the House.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps it would be wise to follow the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and for a moment conduct a school for the benefit of the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House.

Mr. PAYNE. A sort of kindergarten experience.

Mr. MANN. Yes. The gentleman from Alabama stated yesterday——

Mr. BUCHANAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield to his colleague [Mr. BUCHANAN]?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman stated in his remarks that he based his information on public ignorance, I believe.

Mr. PAYNE. He did not say any such thing.

Mr. MANN. I am better skilled in using parliamentary language than my colleague from Illinois is, and I do not use unparliamentary language.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I possibly misunderstood the gentleman. I understood you to say——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is a demonstration of the truth of the gentleman's statement, then.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What I did want to ask is, that if your statement is based on that information, having been here 14 years, I believe, how much would a Member know if he were here twice that long? Would he know anything?

Mr. MANN. I am frank to say that in the case of my colleague it would be somewhat doubtful. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman yesterday stated that the receipts for the fiscal year were estimated to be $625,000,000 plus. He took those figures from a column which gives the ordinary receipts for this fiscal year up to the end of June 5, and if he will examine, or other gentlemen on that side of the House will examine, the statement of yesterday there will be found under the first column "Receipts for this day, $2,509,137.19," and if they will take the trouble to add the receipts for yesterday to the figures given by the gentleman from his column yesterday, $625,071,413.90, that will make the sum given in the same place in the statement for yesterday $627,580,551.09.

And if the gentlemen on that side of the House, now that they have commenced the serious study of revenue measures, will examine this statement from day to day they will discover that every day the receipts for that day are given, and that if the receipts for that day are added to the "total receipts for the fiscal year" of the previous day, they will equal the "receipts for the fiscal year" in the daily statement.

I am somewhat surprised that it is necessary to give this information to gentlemen on that side of the House. Both the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and myself yesterday endeavored to prevent the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] crawling into a hole from which there was no escape, but, with a fatuousness which the gentelman seldom exhibits, he insisted upon it. And it was perfectly evident, as suggested over here yesterday, that there was no Member on the Democratic side of the House who knew any better. [Applause on the Republican side.] And, of course, they applauded the gentleman from Alabama as though he was a rooster that had just emerged triumphantly from a cockfight. [Laughter.]

The statement made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the estimated ordinary receipts of the Government for the fiscal year which ends on the 30th of this month were $625,000,000 for the year was not only based upon a lack of knowledge and understanding of the daily Treasury estimate, but is very wide of the real estimate of receipts. In the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury submitted last November or December he estimated the ordinary receipts of the Government for this fiscal year at $678,000,000, as against estimated ordinary expenditures of $662,000,000, or an estimated surplus of $16,000,000. I am informed now that the present estimates of the Treasury Department place the estimated ordinary receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30 next at $685,000,000 and the estimated ordinary expenditures for the year at $660,000,000, showing an estimated surplus of $25,000,000 under the operation of the existing Payne tariff law. If this statement could only be inserted in the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], what would there be left of the reason given by him for bringing in this present bill with the rates of duty named in it?

PROTECTION AND REVENUE.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to detain the House for a short time in discussing this bill from two standpoints—first, from the standpoint of a protective tariff; and, second, from the standpoint of a revenue tariff; first, what its effect is as to protection and upon the industries of the country; and, second, as to its fairness, if passed, in the raising of revenue as a revenue measure.

The bill proposes to put an ad valorem tariff of 20 per cent, equivalent to about 5 cents a pound, on wool and to reduce the tariff on woolen goods, and it is stated by the gentlemen making the report that the average ad valorem rate of duty on woolen goods is fixed by this bill at 42.55 per cent, and that the average ad valorem rate of duty under the Wilson law was 47.84 per cent; in other words, that by this bill it is proposed to levy an ad valorem rate of duty on woolen manufactures 5 per cent in the percentage less than under the Wilson law, or 42½ per cent practically, as against 47⅞ per cent under the Wilson law.

Under the Wilson law wool came in free. Under this bill it is proposed that the manufacturer shall pay a tariff duty of 20 per cent on wool, and yet that woolen goods shall be protected less than they were under the Wilson law when wool was free. When I first saw this bill I felt like welcoming the gentleman from Alabama into the protective ranks. He proposed to put a tariff on raw wool, purely a protective tariff, so far as it is concerned. To that extent he has been compelled to yield to gentlemen on that side of the House who are interested in the production of wool and the growth of the sheep business. There has always been a controversy in the country as to whether raw materials, so called, should be protected by tariff taxes. The Wilson law gave free wool to the manufacturer and 47 per cent protection in the way of a tariff on the manufactured article. This bill proposes to compel the manufacturer to pay about 5 cents a pound more for his high-grade wools and from 2 to 3 cents more a pound for his carpet wools, and to reduce the protection on the manufactured articles from the amount carried by the Wilson law.

Now, what is the effect of this? We consume in the United States, according to such information as I have been able to get, probably between 500,000,000 and 600,000,000 pounds of wool a year. The average for a number of years has been much less than that, but probably it is now—under our protective system fostering the industry—probably it is up where we consume in the neighborhood of 550,000,000 to 600,000,000 pounds of wool including in that probably shoddy and waste reduced to wool in the grease. We imported last year about 250,000,000 pounds of wool in the grease and produced apparently about 300,000,000 pounds of wool in the grease, it being impossible to ascertain absolutely, because it is not possible to reduce all wool to wool in the grease in the form in which it comes to the market. Bear in mind, we produced in the neighborhood of 300,000,000 pounds of wool in this country last year, possibly a little more.

What, now, is the proposition in the bill and in the estimates made by the committee in reporting it? They estimate that there will be an increase in the importation of wool from $47,687,293 worth to $66,991,000 worth, or an increase in the importation of raw wool of $19,303,706 worth. The average value of class 1 wool imported last year was 18.6 cents per pound; and if the average value for the first fiscal year that this bill would be in operation were the same, there would be, with the estimate that the gentleman has made, an increase in the importations of wool of 103,783,370 pounds.

That is, according to the estimate made by the gentleman on this bill in presenting it, we are to import each year raw wool to the extent of over 103,000,000 pounds more than we imported in the year 1910, which was our banner year. What more? The gentleman estimates that we will import of noils and waste—noils being the product that comes out when wool is combed to make worsteds and used in the manufacture of other woolen goods—the estimate is that the increased importation of noils will be $686,990.75 worth, an increase from $203,509 to $890,500. The average value of noils imported was 35.2 cents per pound, and that would give an increase of 195,167 pounds. Noils reduced to wool—that is, multiplied by two, as a low estimate—would give 390,335 pounds.

The committee reporting the bill reported estimates of increased importations under the bill over those for the last fiscal year under the present Payne law. I have reduced those estimates to raw wool, except as to carpets and rugs, as follows:

Paragraph 3.—Combed wool, roving, etc.

Estimated importations	$732,500.00
Actual importations	1,129.80
Estimated increase of importations	731,370.20

divided by average value per pound, $0.537, equals estimated increase in pounds, 136,195, multiplied by 3, equals pounds wool in the grease, 518,585.

Paragraph 4.—Yarns.

Estimated importations	$1,373,900.00
Actual importations	326,886.02
Estimated increase of importations	1,047,013.98

divided by average value per pound, $0.908, equals estimated increase in pounds, 115,309, multiplied by 3, equals pounds wool in the grease, 345,927.

Paragraph 5.—Cloths, knit fabrics, etc.

Estimated importations	$24,062,400.00
Actual importations	6,658,288.07
Estimated increase of importations	17,404,111.93

divided by average value per pound, $1.04, equals estimated increase in pounds, 16,734,723, multiplied by 3½, equals pounds wool in the grease, 58,571,530.

Paragraph 6.—Blankets and flannels.

Estimated importations	$258,400.00
Actual importations	168,889.82
Estimated increase of importations	89,510.18

Estimated 1 pound for $1 gives increase in pounds, 89,510, multiplied by 3½, equals pounds wool in the grease, 313,285.

Paragraph 7.—Women's and children's dress goods, linings, etc.

Estimated importations	$25,408,500.00
Actual importations	9,218,374.10
Estimated increase of importations	16,190,125.90

Estimated 1 pound for $1 gives estimated increase in pounds (ultra conservative), 16,190,125, multiplied by 2 (one-half wool), equals pounds wool in the grease, 32,380,250.

Paragraph 8.—Ready-made clothing, wearing apparel, etc.

Estimated importations	$5,066,400.00
Actual importations	1,776,236.34
Estimated increase of importations	3,290,163.66

divided by average value per pound, $2.06, equals estimated increase in pounds, 1,597,166, multiplied by 4, equals pounds wool in the grease, 6,388,664.

Paragraph 9.—Webbings, gorings, suspenders, etc.

Estimated importations	$160,900.00
Actual importations	77,161.70

divided by average value per pound, $1.85, equals estimated increase in pounds, 45,263, multiplied by 2, equals pounds wool in the grease, 90,526.

Under the figures submitted by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, of the estimated increases which he says that he and the Treasury Department have figured out, the total increases for the first fiscal year of operation under the new bill would amount to increased importations of wool in the grease, and clothing and cloth reduced to wool in the grease, of 202,782,472 pounds. Here is a statement, made by the chairman of the committee in submitting this bill, which proposes that under the bill there will be an increase in importations of wool or manufactured articles reduced to wool amounting to over 200,000,000 pounds of wool more than is now imported, when our entire production of wool in this country is now in the neighborhood of only 300,000,000 pounds of wool in the grease.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will allow me——

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not responsible, and I do not want it to go into the RECORD as if I appeared to be responsible, for the gentleman's statement in pounds. The gentleman is inaccurate in his estimate when he counts 3½ pounds of wool into a pound of cloth. He overlooks the part of the wool that is used for noils, and this foreign wool does not shrink to the extent that the gentleman makes his estimate. So, therefore, unless the gentleman can produce figures that I have seen nowhere, he can not sustain that estimate, because he can not prove that this foreign wool takes 3½ pounds to make a pound of cloth. As nearly as I can estimate, on the average foreign wool of first and second class that comes in here, 2½ pounds would be a full estimate for the shrinkage.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Chairman, it makes no difference whether foreign wool shrinks. If the foreign wool does not shrink any at all when made into cloth, on this increase it takes the place of that much American wool which does shrink. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is taking the estimate of dollars of cloth that would come in and then figuring that it takes 3½ pounds of foreign wool to make up 1 yard of cloth. So he is making his estimate of the foreign wool that comes in.

Mr. MANN. I am making my estimate of what American wool will be displaced by the importation the gentleman speaks of. [Applause on the Republican side.] I have made an exceedingly low estimate, because, on the average, American wool will not produce a pound of cloth from 3½ pounds of wool in the grease.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Assuming the gentleman's figures as to the increased importations to be true, does the gentleman hold that under the proposed bill domestic wool will be displaced to that extent?

Mr. MANN. Well, I propose to discuss that in a moment.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Because I want to suggest to the gentleman an illustration showing the inaccuracy and unreliability of determining a result by statistics.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Colorado and I will wholly agree about that. I am only taking the statistics and analyzing them as presented by the committee of the party of which the gentleman is a member, following caucus action, assuming that is the basis of this bill. I am examining the bill now from a protective standpoint, and I will later examine it from a revenue standpoint.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman does not care to answer whether the American wool will be displaced to the extent of the figures given by him—202,000,000 pounds—by reason of increased importation?

Mr. MANN. I think probably it would be displaced if the importations actually occur.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman does not think that the importations will actually occur however?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether they will or not. Nobody knows, that is the estimate of the gentleman from Alabama. Whether they will actually occur or not I do not know. I do not pretend to know these things. If I had my way about it I would wait, in making up a tariff bill, until I had the complete and intelligent report from the Tariff Board appointed by this Government for the purpose of acquiring information, so that I would have information and not be proceeding blindly and in the dark. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman from Illinois is usually very kind about yielding for interruptions.

Mr. MANN. I gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have worked out a brief illustration on the point he has touched upon and I would like to call it to his attention.

Mr. MANN. I do not object.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman states, in the minority report, he has increased the figures somewhat——

Mr. MANN. I did not write the minority report.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That there would be increased importation, to meet the revenue estimated by the majority, of 189,421,147 pounds of wool. Now, assuming that the wool consumed in the United States next year will be the same as it was last, that is, 581,000,000 pounds, and that this 189,421,000 pounds will displace that amount of domestic wool, that would seem to be the point the gentleman is driving at, that would mean that next year, instead of producing 55 per cent of the total consumption of the wool in this country, we would produce but 22½ per cent. That would be the shrinkage in order to make room for that displacement. I have looked at the figures under the Wilson bill and I find in the last year under that bill, 1897, the American wool production in round numbers was 260,000,000 pounds, which was more than 80 per cent of what we produced last year.

Of course, as everybody well knows, and I do not think it needs to be reiterated here, I am anxious to find out the truth, for I think I have as much interest in this measure as anybody, and if I had to draft a wool schedule perhaps it would not suit either side. But I can not find any basis, even taking the Wilson bill in the worst year—the bill being attended by conditions for which it was in nowise responsible—I say I can not find any basis to justify the assumption that the estimates made by the minority of increased importation will displace that amount of domestic wool. Leaving all figures out, I am confident I could make the prediction that the production of domestic wool will not be reduced to 22½ per cent of the total amount. I doubt very much whether it will be reduced below one-half of the consumption in this country, and if it does not reduce far below one-half, the gentleman's deduction absolutely fails.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in just a minute. A little knowledge, Mr. Chairman, is always a dangerous thing. I do not criticize my friend from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], because he, like me, is in need of some information from some responsible body on this subject; but on this particular subject I can give him the information he has been seeking. The gentleman states that during the time of the Wilson bill the production of wool in the United States did not fall off in the manner in which he might think I was endeavoring to demonstrate; that is, although there were large importations under the Wilson bill, the production of wool did not cease. The production of American wool in 1896 was 272,000,000 pounds; in 1897, 259,000,000 pounds. The importations of wool in 1897 were 356,000,000 pounds. I was endeavoring to show how the increased importations would take the place of American wool.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would like to know where the gentleman got those figures. I have a table here from the Agricultural Department showing the importations were 350,000,000 and odd pounds in 1897.

Mr. MANN. That is very likely. I have the table of the Woolgrowers' Association, which is usually considered substantially correct. No one denies that. The gentleman's own committee uses it in the figures it gives. The official figures are the same.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I will state to the gentleman that the committee is compelled to use it for the reason that the Agricultural Department takes the woolgrowers' figures.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I do not suppose they are absolutely accurate, but I think everybody relies on these figures as being substantially accurate, or as nearly accurate as anybody can collect them at this time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LAMB). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one hour more.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] assumes that because there were large importations and a large production of wool that year that it was consumed that year, but the gentleman from Colorado is wise enough to know that if men have sheep they will shear them, but that if the importations and the production go away beyond the consumption that soon the man will be compelled to cease keeping sheep. What are the facts? In 1897 the American wool produced was 259,153,251 pounds. The importation of wool amounted to 356,839,482 pounds and, in addition, 44,505,470 pounds of waste, shoddy, and rags. There were carried over from the previous year 393,986,523 pounds, and there were consumed 460,000,000 pounds. According to the estimate of the Wool Growers' Association, there were carried over 794,000,000 pounds of wool, including an estimated arbitrary addition of 200,000,000 added to cover the increased efficiency of 113,958,915 pounds of wastes and shoddy imported in 1895, 1896, and 1897 over grease wool. At the end of 1908 there were carried over only 228,000,000 pounds of wool. Wool is not like radishes; it is not like raw vegetables; it does not even require to be placed in cold storage to keep. It was produced in 1897, but not consumed. What is the effect of an overproduction carried on for years? It is calamity and destruction to the production. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is exactly what was happening to the wool-production industry in the United States when the people changed the policy of the country and the Dingley law was passed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will say there it is not necessary to confine that to one year. You can take that whole depressed period through there.

Mr. MANN. I have the figures for the entire period from 1896 to 1908, and I will be very glad to give them to the gentleman, or refer him to page 5251 of the hearings on the Payne tariff bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I think the gentleman will find, considering the depressed conditions of that period of time, for which the Wilson bill was not responsible at all [cries of "Oh, no!" and laughter on the Republican side]—oh, I was one of those fellows who was burning corn in Kansas for several years prior to the enactment of the Wilson bill, because it was not worth hauling to town, so I have some actual experience on this question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I do not now want to discuss that subject with the gentleman. I am willing to discuss the proposition with the gentleman, but I can not permit the gentleman in my time to get up a controversy with somebody else in the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to say that, considering those depressed conditions, when people were not able to buy things if they were cheap, wool production was fairly sustained relatively throughout the entire period, indicating that even free raw wool was not able to destroy the wool industry of the United States.

Now, the gentleman starts out with a line of reasoning, backed by statistics here, that would go to indicate that even under the vastly different conditions now obtaining, with the 20 per cent ad valorem tariff, American production will be absolutely displaced in this country.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield——

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Colorado has been endeavoring to elucidate the situation. For the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois and the House generally I suppose the gentleman from Illinois would have no objection to the gentleman from Colorado enlightening us as to the comparative prices that the woolgrowers in his locality received for their wool during the Wilson bill as compared with the prices they received prior to the passage of that bill.

Mr. MANN. Well——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Let me answer——

Mr. MANN. I think not. Mr. Chairman, I have great sympathy for the gentleman from Colorado. I have yielded very generously to him. I have great sympathy for any man who has the steam roller applied to him, because I know how it is myself now. [Laughter.] The gentleman has been knocked down and run over. [Laughter.] He is compelled to kiss the hand that smites him. [Applause on the Republican side.] He has to vote for a bill that will help destroy the industries in his State, and he is surely between the devil and the deep blue sea. If I can afford any comfort to him, a lone mariner on a wild waste, I will be most glad to do it. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman seemed to be threatening to drive me deeper in and I wanted to head him off.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I yield for a question.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I am trying to find out whether or not the gentleman and myself agree. It seems to me there is one element that the gentleman has left out in calculating whether or not foreign wool will displace domestic wool. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the well-known fact, as I have no doubt the hearings to which he has referred disclosed, that vast quantities of shoddy and cotton are now incorporated into so-called woolen fabrics because of the tremendous duty on wool and of the extraordinary high duties upon woolen fabrics?

Mr. MANN. I will reach that in a moment, I think.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I yield for a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman leaves the revenue question. This is the question: Is it not a fact that unless foreign wool is imported to the extent indicated by the figures the gentleman has given in his analysis, displacing American wool to that extent, the plan of the opposition in raising revenue upon wool importations must fail?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct. The gentleman from Alabama questioned the figures which I gave and the deductions which I made. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I venture to say that on the average raw wool does shrink so that it will require 3½ pounds of wool to make 1 pound of cloth (not women's dress goods). But whether it does or not, it makes no difference with the argument which I am making, because when a pound of cloth is imported it takes the place of a pound of cloth which would otherwise be made in this country, and takes the place of wool which would otherwise be raised in this country, and the average shrinkage of the wool of this country from the wool in the grease to the scoured wool is nearly 3 pounds, and before it reaches the cloth is more than three pounds and a half on the average, and when I made my estimate on women's and children's dress goods, which are not imported by the pound and which do not consist entirely of wool, I did not take the estimate even so high as that made by the committee. They report in their schedule attached to the bill that they figure 3 pounds of wool in the grease for each pound or dollar's worth of cloth or dress goods.

On the contrary, when I made my figures on women's and children's dress goods, I only took 2½ pounds of wool to each dollar's worth of dress goods.

Mr. HULL. To understand the gentleman more fully, I would like to inquire whether he agrees with this statement made by Mr. S. N. D. North, who was one of the authorities on the wool question, and who is reported to have been largely instrumental in securing an enactment——

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants to ask me a question as to a fact, I will be glad to answer it. I do not remember Mr. North's testimony. If he wants to ask me a question on the facts, I will be glad to answer him if I have the ability so to do.

Mr. HULL. I wish to know if the gentleman agreed, and, if he did not agree, what reason he had for not doing so? But if the gentleman declines——

Mr. MANN. I decline simply for the reason given. One of several things is absolutely true and not escapable. If we increase the importation of wools and woolens to the extent which has been proposed and estimated for by the committee, there will be a reduction in the use of American wool or increased consumption in the woolen goods produced. Either we will make less woolen goods out of American wool or stop using some other kind of goods and use woolen goods in their stead, or increase the consumption of all kinds of goods. Now, gentlemen may say that we will increase vastly the consumption of woolen goods because we cheapen their price. No one here believes there will be any great decrease in the price of manufactured clothing to the consumer. And no one here believes there will be any great increase in the consumption of these goods. When the Wilson bill was made the law there was no increase in the consumption of goods. Gentlemen say it was because of the hard times. Very well; that may be true. But there will be no substantial increase in the consumption of woolen goods or other goods, because in the main the people of the United States are now able to buy those goods which are essential to their comfort and to their convenience.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] suggests that under this bill the manufacturers will use American wool instead of shoddy. There is now a prohibitory tariff on shoddy of 25 cents a pound, I believe. The shoddy that is produced in this country is used; shoddy is too valuable to throw away. It makes fairly valuable filling, and very few men who are not experts can tell the difference between woolen cloth with shoddy and woolen cloth without shoddy while it is new. Shoddy does not wear so long. It is not so valuable. But now manufacturers can not use shoddy, except that which is produced in this country. But under this bill, as under the Wilson law, there is an invitation to import shoddy from abroad; and England manufactures over 600,000,000 pounds of shoddy a year, which she largely exports and which will largely come to this country, to be used in the clothing of the poor and to swindle the poor, under this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, who is consuming the shoddy now, the poor or the rich?

Mr. MANN. The poor of other countries are consuming the shoddy now. [Applause on the Republican side.] Let me tell the gentleman that the only army in the world that does not wear shoddy clothing is the American Army. [Applause on the Republican side.] And the only poor people in the world who wear woolen clothing that is not shoddy are the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I am in sympathy with the statement the gentleman has made, and I would like to know if it would not be a very good answer to the gentleman from New Jersey that that is the only way that there can be any greater consumption of goods, namely, by getting the shoddy into it so that it will wear out? In other words, is not there a limit to staying awake nights in order to wear out clothing?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman suggests a proposition. It is quite likely, under the suggestion of the two gentlemen on that side of the House, that there will be an increase in the consumption of woolen goods under this bill, because they will largely be made of shoddy, which will wear out so soon that you will have to buy a new suit. I prefer to give men good clothing, made from American wool, rather than shoddy clothing, which is valueless, made from foreign shoddy. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. And, therefore, if it is good woolen goods there can not be any great amount more of consumption?

Mr. MANN. I was going to say that I think there can not be, except in this respect:

It is undoubtedly true that a considerable quantity of clothing, especially for women and children, and underwear is now made by the mixture of cotton with wool. Many people do not like to wear pure woolen underclothing; at least most people do not wear it. To-day there is an advantage to the manufacturer in combining cotton with wool in many classes of goods, and I am amused at the anxiety of the gentlemen from the South to cut off one of the sources of the consumption of cotton in order to increase the production of wool in Argentina and Australia. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Some people believe it is not desirable to wear woolen underclothing all the time. I do not know what my distinguished friend, the doctor from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], would say about that. I used to think it essential, and used to wear woolen underclothing winter and summer—a very light wool in the summer time.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I would suggest to my colleague from Illinois that, especially in wintertime, would I think people living in a cold climate should wear woolen underclothing, and it ought to be made cheap enough so that they could afford to buy it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I think that is true, and yet many people believe it is not desirable to wear woolen underclothing in the summer time, and there is a very respectable belief now that woolen underclothing is not healthful. While I have not that belief——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I am very glad to know that my colleague has not gone to that extent. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that a great many people now wear underclothing of the same weight and of the same kind throughout the year, and they insist that it is far more healthful.

Now, one of the great arguments made by all the people who have testified for cheaper wool and free wool is that it will enable the manufacturers to use less cotton and more wool. I do not know whether that is true or not; but I am just as much opposed to cutting off the use of cotton in this country in manufactures as I am to the cutting off of the use of wool. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the greatest sign in our country of a lack of intelligent scientific government is the fact that we export—what is it—$600,000,000 worth of cotton to be manufactured abroad instead of sending the manufactured product abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman says that he regrets we can not manufacture all the cotton. Is it not a fact, with the increased establishment of cotton manufactories all over the South and elsewhere, they have been unable to consume more than one-third of the product of the cotton crop?

Mr. MANN. Well, I take the gentleman's figures for it. I do not remember the exact proportions.

It is another noteworthy fact, Mr. Chairman, that if that side of the House deals with the cotton schedule as it is now proposing to deal with the woolen schedule, there will be still more cotton sent abroad and fewer manufacturing establishments running in the South. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman further?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say to the gentleman that my judgment is that his opinion is erroneous.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. BARTLETT. So far as I am informed—and I live in a district where there are a number of cotton manufactories—the cotton manufacturers in the district which I represent, and I believe in most of the districts of the South, desire not protection but broader markets to sell their products in. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I am in favor of giving them broader markets. And that reminds me, Mr. Chairman, of a query: Is this bill designed to give broader markets to the American manufacturer of woolen goods? You propose to make him pay 5 cents more a pound for the wool he uses in competition with the free wool used in Great Britain and Germany and France. Can he sell any goods in the markets of the world outside of the United States under such a condition? Is this bill designed to broaden the markets of America? It is a bill which levies a tariff of 5 cents a pound on wool. Is that designed to broaden the markets of the American manufacturer?

Mr. AUSTIN. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to state that one of the largest cotton manufacturers of the district that I have the honor to represent on this floor was here during the present week. He was not only a prominent and influential manufacturer, but a leader of the Democratic Party. He was here attending a conference at the New Willard Hotel of the representatives of the northern and southern cotton manufacturing plants for the purpose of appealing to this Democratic Congress not to make any change in the present cotton schedule. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Is there anything unusual about that? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama on yesterday stated that when they proposed an ad valorem tariff on raw wool, in "justice" to the manufacturer, they had put a higher tariff on the manufactured product. On this side of the House we call it "a protective tariff." On that side of the House the gentleman from Alabama calls it "justice." It is both. A protective tariff is justice. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman misquoted me.

Mr. MANN. I did not intentionally misquote the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was simply talking about the case where you carry a compensatory duty on the finished product. That is justice, not a tariff levied to protect the manufacturer; not at all.

Mr. MANN. Do I misunderstand the gentleman? He stated that because there was an ad valorem duty on raw wool, therefore, in justice to the manufacturers, they had fixed the duty on the manufactured article at such a rate——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. What is the basis of the gentleman's objection to my statement?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I simply said that where you put a tax on raw wool it was necessary, in justice to the manufacturer, to carry into the finished product sufficient ad valorem taxation to equalize that amount.

Mr. MANN. Absolutely, that is to protect the manufacturer from the effect upon him of a tariff on the raw material.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no. Not protection at all.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman called it "justice." I call it protection. It means the same thing, because it accomplishes the same result. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is where the gentleman is wrong. We carried into the tariff an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent as a matter of justice to the manufacturer. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would be repudiated by his Republican side of the House if he said an ad valorem tax of 10 per cent on wool was protection.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but the gentleman carries an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent on wool, and because of that tariff on wool he carries an additional ad valorem on the manufactured product of 10 per cent to compensate the manufacturer and protect him from the foreign manufacturer, because the American manufacturer has to pay the tariff on wool—absolute protection, a compensating protection. I do not complain of it. The gentleman from Alabama calls it justice. I call it protection; but it would be still more just if the figures were better aligned with each other. It is protection, though it is not ample protection.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on that subject let us see whether they have given compensation to the American manufacturer.

Assuming the average import value of cloths at $1 per pound, which is slightly less than $1.04 per pound, the actual value for the last fiscal year, and taking the average ad valorem rate under the Payne law of 97.11 per cent, would give a duty per pound of 97 cents on woolen cloth imported last year.

If we assume 4 pounds of wool in the grease per pound of cloth and take off the compensatory duty of 44 cents, it would leave a protective duty per pound of 57 cents under the Payne law.

Or, if we assume 3 pounds of grease wool to 1 pound of cloth, and subtract 33 cents from 97 cents, it would leave a protective duty under the Payne law of 64 cents a pound.

Under the Underwood bill, assuming the same import value per pound, the duty would be 40 cents a pound.

The average value of class 1 wool imported was 23 cents per pound, of which 20 per cent would be 4.75 cents; or, assuming 4 pounds of grease wool to 1 pound of cloth, it would amount to 17 cents that the manufacturer pays on wool for each pound of cloth made, as wool duty; and, subtracting 17 cents from the 40 cents actual duty, would leave the manufacturer a protection of 23 cents per pound, on the basis of 4 pounds of wool and 1 pound of cloth, under the Underwood bill, instead of 57 cents under the Payne law, a reduction of 34 cents protective duty per pound, or a reduction of 60 per cent of the protective duty of the present law.

Or, if we assume 3 pounds of grease wool to 1 pound of cloth, the manufacturer would pay three times the wool duty on 1 pound, or 14¼ cents wool duty per pound of cloth, which, subtracted from 40 cents, would leave 25¾ cents as the actual protective duty under the Underwood bill, as against 64 cents under the Payne law, a loss of 38 cents a pound.

The ad valorem duty fixed upon the woolen manufactured product in the pending bill is in nowise compensatory for the tariff levied upon the raw wool. In fact, as I stated in the opening, the ad valorem tax upon the manufactured product is less under this bill than it was under the Wilson law, when the manufacturer obtained his raw wool without paying any duty whatever upon it.

I maintain therefore, Mr. Chairman, that so far as protection is concerned—and in that I agree with the gentleman from Alabama—this bill entirely eliminates the idea of protection to the American manufacturer of woolen goods. It pays no attention to the industries of the country. It will not open a single new mill in the United States. It will open many new mills in foreign lands. It will not cause the production of a single bushel of corn or wheat in this country, to help feed the laborer working in the woolen mills of this country, but it will cause a larger exportation and a lower price for American agricultural products in competition with the agricultural products of other countries. It is not destined and is not designed to add anything to our manufacturing industries. It abandons the idea of a home market for the American people. It removes the scheme of building up industries here which will consume our products at home, instead of compelling us to send them abroad. It loses sight of the principle that a surplus of a product always vastly decreases the value and price of the product. If we can manufacture at home and keep men employed in our own land, so that they will consume the agricultural products which we produce in the main, the price of those products can be upheld, but when we are compelled to send abroad a larger surplus in competition with other countries it means the lowering of our prices to meet the lowering prices of other countries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a moment on the question of the revenue features of this bill. By the gentleman who introduces it and the committee which reports it, it is justified solely as a revenue measure. The gentleman from Alabama stated yesterday that he hoped that this bill might remain the law without change for a good many years, or words to that effect. It is not, therefore, destined to be the law only until other schedules are revised. The gentlemen have brought in a bill to revise but one schedule of the tariff law, and say that if that bill be made a law it is to remain the law. We must therefore judge it in comparison with other propositions which are in the law or which may be written in the law.

Not protection, but revenue. Why should we levy a tariff for revenue purposes of 45 per cent on women's and children's dress goods and let raw rubber come in free? Answer that.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. We have not revised that schedule. The gentleman's own party revised that schedule; and why did he not make some objection at the time?

Mr. MANN. We do not believe in your theory of a revenue tariff.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Would the gentleman vote for a duty on raw rubber?

Mr. MANN. Very likely; but that is not the question. The gentleman's side of the House is making a permanent revision of the tariff on the woolen schedule. They declare for this woolen schedule as a permanent policy, and that there should be a tariff of 45 per cent on women's and children's dress goods.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. POU. Did not the gentleman's party also legislate, and after that legislation was over, did not your own President say that Schedule K was indefensible from any standpoint? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have always noticed that when you are really pressing a question which nobody wants to answer they get up and call you names. Why does not the gentleman answer the question I put: Are you in favor of putting a permanent tariff of 45 per cent, as a revenue measure, on women's and children's dress goods?

Mr. POU. I am in favor of a duty which will raise the largest amount of revenue.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is in favor of a duty which will raise the largest amount of revenue. I suppose he is in favor of the proposition which will raise the largest amount of duty on everything. Why, we could levy a tariff which would raise a billion dollars in import duties. The gentleman favors that. I do not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. POU. I would like to ask the gentleman if he favors the continuance of Schedule K, which President Taft says was indefensible from any standpoint?

Mr. MANN. I much prefer it to this bill. Now, having answered the gentleman's question, I notice that he does not answer mine. Is the gentleman in favor of a tariff of 45 per cent permanently, as a revenue measure, on women's and children's dress goods?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman upon what authority he makes the statement that this is a permanent tariff bill, when the Democratic platform has declared in favor of a gradual reduction of the high-protective duties imposed by the Republican Party?

Mr. MANN. Now I am at the fount of information, and I will get it if I can. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The gentleman is able to speak with some authority. If this bill becomes a law, does the gentleman favor changing it next year?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I believe my party would be in favor of redeeming the platform pledge—to gradually reduce the duties to a purely revenue basis.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman favor another woolen-schedule bill next year, if this becomes a law?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not know when the next one will be brought in; but it will be in accordance with the Democratic platform.

Mr. MANN. That is like making a statement with your fingers crossed. [Laughter.] Either these gentlemen are for or against a revenue tariff which puts a tax of 45 per cent on women's and children's dress goods as a revenue measure.

They can not dodge that issue by saying, "Oh, we are going to vote for it, but we are going to change it to-morrow." Legislation is supposed to remain; they can not avoid the responsibility. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if I remember correctly, the gentleman from Illinois voted against the Payne-Aldrich bill when it passed the House, and I want to ask him whether or not any iniquities which might have been in Schedule K induced him to cast that vote?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if there were iniquities in the Payne tariff law and if I voted against it, I shall at least maintain a record clear by voting against the iniquities in this bill, and that is more than the gentleman will. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. But the gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. MANN. That question is not before the House.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to know whether any iniquities which may have existed in the Payne bill induced the gentleman to vote against it?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, some day I will take a day off and explain to the gentleman why I voted against the conference report on the Payne tariff law. Everybody in the House, save the gentleman from Indiana, knows why I did that.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Well, I thought I knew why the gentleman voted against it, personally, but I wanted to hear him say it. I wanted to know what his views were about it.

Mr. MANN. I notice the moment the gentlemen bring in a tariff bill and I commence to talk about it, they want to discuss some other subject. Why do you not discuss the bill that is before the House? Why are you afraid of it?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Oh, we will discuss it.

Mr. MANN. Are you in favor of putting a permanent revenue tariff on women and children's dress goods of 45 per cent?

Mr. COX of Indiana. If the gentleman will wait a few days I think I will tell him.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I know the gentleman is not prepared to say it now. Perhaps he will change his mind, notwithstanding the Democratic caucus which binds him so that no matter what he thinks, his vote is delivered in advance. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] I would not be in the position of a slave to a master who is a man or to a master who was a caucus. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does not the gentleman believe in party caucuses?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Was not the gentleman in his party caucus when it caucused here for two days on the postal savings bank?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. And bound yourself by that caucus?

Mr. MANN. I gave notice that I might not be bound by it and I never have asked anyone to bind himself to vote against his conscience by a caucus. Does the gentleman's conscience forbid him to vote for a tariff of $4.50 on every $10 woman's suit? Will the gentleman answer? No; he sits silent. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will answer the gentleman at the proper time.

Mr. MANN. This is the proper time.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. The audience is now here, but the gentleman will wait until no one is in the House and then deliver himself.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will be here.

Mr. MANN. Oh, if I knew the gentleman was going to talk I might be, but probably I will not be.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman, in answer to the question which my friend from Indiana desires to defer, that I am willing to answer it now, and say that I would rather vote for a duty which will put $4.50 upon every $10 woman's suit than keep on the statute books a bill which makes it necessary to pay $9.70 on every $10 woman's suit. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. That is not an answer to the question. You are making up a new bill; you are bound by what you do, not by what we did. You can not escape from the responsibility that you have because of something that we did. You are proposing this bill and you can make it 45 per cent or 25 per cent, and when you vote for this bill you declare to the world that, as a matter of revenue, not protection, not to build up American industries, but as a matter of revenue, you propose to put a tax of $4.50 on every $10 worth of women's and children's goods. But why, what made you——

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly. The gentleman is on my side, but he is afraid to say so. I gladly yield to him.

Mr. GARNER. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he thinks that $4.50 is too high on a $10 suit?

Mr. MANN. Why, it is too high as a revenue tax; of course it is.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. As a revenue proposition, who can defend 45 per cent on clothing and dress goods when india rubber to the extent of $106,000,000 comes in free, when raw silk and silks to the extent of $67,000,000 come in free, when chemicals to the extent of $50,000,000 come in free, when copper to the extent of $45,000,000 comes in free, when oils (mainly vegetable) to the extent of $16,000,000 come in free, when cabinet woods and so forth to the extent of $15,000,000 come in free, when diamonds and other precious stones to the extent of $10,000,000 come in free, all of which could be properly taxed as a revenue proposition? And the gentlemen on the Democratic side turn aside from these and propose to put a high revenue tariff on their children's clothes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. What organization controlled this House when this law was passed to put these things on the free list?

Mr. MANN. Why, Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman from Texas is unusually acute and bright——

Mr. GARNER. Yes; but what party was in power when they put 97 per cent on my children's clothes?

Mr. MANN. Oh, we still favor the proposition to put tariff enough on them to have them made in America as a protective measure. [Applause on the Republican side.] We are in favor yet of letting noncompetitive articles come in free and levying the duty necessary to raise the revenue upon competitive articles, with incidental protection, but the gentleman casts aside that doctrine and proposes to lose sight of the value there is to America through the protective tariff and proposes to levy this purely as a revenue measure, $4.50 as a revenue measure on children's clothing, while rubber comes in free, used by the rich. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman must remember that we are revising Schedule K. When we get to the rubber schedule we will put a revenue duty on that, too.

Mr. MANN. That is all right, but the gentleman is now revising Schedule K, and he should revise Schedule K with a view to what they propose to do with the others. Is this revision to be done over again on Schedule K as soon as you reach another schedule? Is this to be a perpetual process—a continuous-performance show? [Applause on the Republican side.] Do I understand that this is like one of the amusement shows that runs around and around, and the moment one performer goes off another performer comes on and follows him, and then when his time comes on he moves on again, and it is a perpetual show? Is it to be that as fast as we revise one schedule we go to another, and when we are through with the list we commence all over again? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. For a question.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is always very kind——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MANN. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. SIMS. Now, my friend, and the friend of all of us, and the country's friend, the gentleman from Illinois, speaks of putting on a tariff or putting a duty on wool or putting a duty on women's and children's clothes. Now, my friend must admit that we are not putting a duty on anything; we are taking off something that is already on. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, if the Republican Party has been making every man wear two shirts, and we do not——

Mr. MANN. And you think only one is necessary? And that is all they will get. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman will not let me finish my question.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman should not ask such a funny question.

Mr. SIMS. But I had not finished. If the Republican Party makes the American people wear two shirts in order to enable the American manufacturer to sell that many more shirts, until an abnormal condition has grown up, would not you think it would be wise enough in taking off or removing that abnormal condition to fix the tariff in such a way as to keep a fellow from having the pneumonia by taking off both shirts at once? Hothouse protection has been responsible partly for the country's condition, and industries have been built up by that alone, and is it not wise and reasonable not to take all the hothouse influences away, although we would not build a hothouse if there was not one already in operation?

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think this tariff bill is partly protection?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think anything about it. I know it is.

Mr. MANN. Well.

Mr. SIMS. I said I absolutely knew it was partly protective.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman believes it is partly protection?

Mr. SIMS. I absolutely know it is. I do not believe about it. There has been no pretension on this side that it was not partly protective. But it is a great deal less protective than that which we have now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I must beg the pardon of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. I desire to speak for myself. I say that the purpose of the committee in drafting this bill was to raise $40,000,000 on Schedule K, and we have written the rates in the bill as low as was possible and still produce $40,000,000. Therefore it is a revenue measure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I ask the gentleman from Alabama if it is in any way a protective measure?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You could not levy a tax of 1 per cent on anything without its carrying with it incidental protection. To that extent it is protection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be misunderstood by both my friend from Alabama and the gentleman from Illinois. I meant to say that there is a condition of high protection as to Schedule K, and it has been impossible, in view of that condition, to remove all protection at once, but there was no purpose to pass a protective measure per se. We all know that a compensatory duty is a protective duty. I do not deny, and my friend from Alabama does not deny it either, if I have understood him accurately.

Mr. MANN. Confession is certainly good for the soul. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], who was not in the Hall at the time, did not hear the argument to show that this was not a protective measure, and to prove, as I think I did, the contention of my able and genial friend from Alabama that this is not a real protective measure, whatever else it may be.

Mr. SIMS. Not in purpose.

Mr. MANN. Not in purpose. It is less in effect than it is in purpose. It was intended in purpose to be of some protection, and some of the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House understood there was a compromise, but they all agreed, with the exception of my friend from Tennessee, to conceal it on the floor of the House. But, in fact, it is not sufficient protection. I was examining it as to whether it was a revenue measure or not, and since the gentleman from Tennessee has directed my attention so pleasantly I will put it to him whether he is in favor as a permanent revenue policy of the country of levying a tax of 45 per cent on children's clothing?

Mr. SIMS. I can answer that very readily, so far as I am concerned. If the condition of the country is such that we do not have to have that revenue, I would not put one cent on children's clothing.

Mr. MANN. We do have to have it. Is the gentleman in favor of raising revenue in that way as a revenue policy?

Mr. SIMS. I may have other preferences, but I am going to vote for the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is entirely unnecessary for any gentleman on that side of the House to say how he is going to vote.

There have been times in the House when it was interesting to have a gentleman on the floor arise and, after an argument, tell how he was going to vote. But gentlemen on that side of the House have gotten so in the habit of arguing on one side and voting on the other that we all know in advance how they will vote. They vote the way they are told to vote by their bosses in the House. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] There never has been a time heretofore in this House, since I have been here, when my genial friend could invariably be delivered in advance, with his vote, to any particular measure in Congress; and the same is true with respect to others. They have talked about autocracy in the House under Speaker CANNON, but there has never been a time before, since I have been in the House, when men on the other side felt obligated to all vote one way because a Democratic caucus threatened to cut the head off any man who has intelligence enough to exercise his independence. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. The explanation of the situation now is that the caucus in this case was made up of this whole side of the House, with the exception of one man. We bound ourselves, and we are going to do what we agreed to do because we thought we ought to do what we agreed to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has had no more to say about what they were to agree to do than I have had. He is doing what the Democratic bosses in the House have told him he has to do. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. I abide by the action of the Democratic caucus.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is absolutely controlled by the caucus to vote the way he is told to vote in the caucus. You gentlemen come here and vote the way the caucus tells you to vote. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. I stand with the majority.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has usually been very independent. I have frequently seen him on the floor of the House voting against his side of the House, and I have frequently voted with him against my side of the House; but the gentleman from Tennessee will no longer exercise his independence, because, having no information on the subject of the wool schedule, he follows blindly the direction—not the lead—of the gentleman from Alabama, who disclosed his wonderful information upon the subject by his quotation from the daily Treasury statement. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

THE TARIFF BOARD.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the final consideration of this bill by the House should be postponed until we have received the report of the Tariff Board. Congress, by special appropriation, has provided for a Tariff Board to acquire and report information relating to the woolen and other schedules. At the last session of Congress we made a large appropriation to enable the Tariff Board to continue its work, and directed that it make a report as to the woolen schedule in December next. Following that appropriation and that specific direction, the Tariff Board, composed partly of Republicans and partly of Democrats, commenced what is believed to be an impartial investigation of the subject of wool production and woolen manufactures. That board has engaged experts who are now actively employed in acquiring more complete information than has ever been acquired before in relation to the production of wool and the cost of its production, in relation to the shrinkage of different kinds and classes of wools in the cleansing processes, in relation to the different characters of wools to be used in the carding and worsted processes of manufacture and other methods of consumption of wool in the manufacture of woolen articles, and in relation to the cost of manufacture, the amount of wool used in the different processes and in the different articles manufactured, and all other information which can be acquired which bears upon the production and consumption of woolen goods.

They are obtaining information concerning the reduction of woolen rags to the form of shoddy, and so forth. They will acquire particular and reliable data concerning every phase of the subject. They will be able to lay before the President for transmission to Congress in December next very full and complete information regarding the production and consumption of wool and woolen goods both in the United States and in the foreign countries from which we obtain a considerable portion of our wool supply.

Formerly the processes of production and manufacture in the United States and elsewhere were carried on largely without the aid of scientific information or scientific processes. The great manufacturers of the world have largely come to realize the necessity of scientific administration and the development of scientific processes. But apparently we have not yet learned the need of scientific methods in governmental development, and least of all do we apply scientific methods in the processes of legislation.

In all the realm of legislation there is no other subject which ought to receive such scientific treatment and be so based upon expert knowledge as in the preparation of tariff legislation, and yet here we are now proposing to legislate concerning one of the most intricate subjects of the tariff—the woolen schedule—without waiting a few short months in order to receive the expert knowledge and the complete information which we have directed a tariff board to gather for us. This is the reverse of a scientific method.

The Democratic side of the House now proposes to legislate on the woolen schedule and receive the needed information after the legislation is disposed of. The country is tired of legislation based upon ignorance and demands legislation based upon knowledge. The country asks that, instead of our legislating first and acquiring information afterwards, we acquire the information first and base our legislation upon the information thus acquired. I am firmly of the opinion that we ought to recommit this bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions that that committee shall hold the bill until the information acquired by the Tariff Board shall be submitted to us in December next and that then a bill should be prepared and considered in the light of the full information we will then have. Haphazard legislation, ill-considered legislation, legislation by ignorance and not with knowledge, may have been necessary in the past, but it is not necessary in these days as to the tariff on wool and woolen goods. It would be better for the country to bear the evils which may exist in the present woolen tariff for a few months longer and have that tariff replaced by well-considered legislation based upon full information, so that the subject may be largely removed from partisan and political changes, rather than correct the present evils with possible and probable new evils, which themselves will again need to be removed by new legislation in the course of the following few months.

I know it is useless to appeal to the Democratic side of this House to wait for information before they legislate. The Democratic Party thrives rather upon ignorance of facts and does best when full information is lacking, and yet there ought to be statesmen enough on the Democratic side to rise above temporary partisan prejudice and party excitement to compel this bill to be laid aside until the information we have demanded and have ordered to be obtained shall be laid before us.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill be examined from the standpoint of protecting the industries of the country, it is a failure. If it be examined from the standpoint of merely raising revenue for the country, it is cruel and unjust. It will feed no children in this land. It will give no pay to laborers in this country by which they may be able to buy good clothing. It will add nothing to the pay of the American workingman. It will add nothing to the profitable use of American capital. It will not build up our country or its manufactures. But, abandoning the sheep industry and the woolen industry to destruction, it then proposes on the woolen goods that come from abroad to take from 40 to 45 per cent as a revenue tariff out of every dollar's worth of goods imported, leaving great numbers of noncompetitive articles still upon the free list.

I leave it to the American Republic and its citizens. They expressed their displeasure with the legislation which we enacted, but we appeal confidently to the intelligence and the patriotism of the American voter that the American Republic is not yet willing to abandon to dire distress and poverty its own citizens and its own industries in order to build up those in foreign lands among foreign people. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HOUSTON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 897. An act for the relief of Alfred L. Dutton.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. HAY in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask how the balance of the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has consumed 2 hours and 30 minutes and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has consumed 2 hours.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour now to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, the plea for delay by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, who has just concluded his entertaining speech, and his appeal for the sacredness of Schedule K as it is written, and his flippant and jocular attempts to divert attention from the real issue, have fallen upon deaf ears on this side, because they were submitted last November to the high court of public opinion—the American people at the ballot bax—and there ruled and adjudged against him. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We, as the agents of that great court, have naught now to do save to carry its judgment into effect.

Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose, in such remarks as I shall offer, to confine myself in the main to Schedule K, because the pending bill deals only with Schedule K.

It is of course impossible, in discussing any tariff schedule, not to discuss tariff principles, precedents, and policies, and while the questions relating to these things are as old as our Government, and while possibly all that can be said upon them has been said, I shall nevertheless ask indulgence in the course of my remarks to express some views and opinions upon them. For these views I ask no man in any political party save myself to be responsible; but, none the less, I believe that what I shall say is in strict accord with the ancient Democratic faith.

EXISTING CONDITIONS.

We are proposing to revise Schedule K. We are proposing a remedy for certain existing conditions. In order to appreciate the necessity for a remedy or the wisdom of the remedy proposed, it is necessary to know something of these conditions.

We find that the operation of Schedule K as it is written has been to give to the American woolen manufacturer almost a complete monopoly of the American market and to make this great country almost a hermit nation so far as the woolen industry is concerned.

In the fiscal year 1909—I use that year because it is the only one for which I have the figures as to production—we produced in the United States a total of $419,826,000 of worsted and woolen goods, and a total of all woolen manufactures of $514,732,000. We imported of these goods a total of $18,102,461 and we exported of them to the value only of $1,971,939. In other words, of our total consumption of woolen manufactures in the year 1909 we imported barely 3½ per cent, and we exported less than one-half of 1 per cent of what we produced. These figures tell their own story of the complete control of the American market given to the American manufacturer, the number of whose establishments decreased from 1,221 in 1899 to 913 in 1909.

To particularize a little about this situation: In the year 1909 we imported woolen cloths to the extent of 4,472,635 yards, of the total value of $4,777,447.26; but in the year 1905, the last year for which I could get the figures as to production, we produced 225,514,931 yards of woolen cloth, valued at $142,497,575. As the total woolen manufactures in this country substantially increased from 1905 to 1909 the production of woolen cloths in 1909 must have been in excess of the production of 1905; but taking the figures of 1905 for comparison, we imported in 1909 a little more than 3 per cent of our total consumption of woolen cloths.

Of blankets, in 1909 we imported the insignificant sum of $25,972.72, and we exported blankets and flannels for underwear to the extent only of $46,000. We produced in that year blankets of all kinds, including all wool and cotton mixed, to the value of $10,222,000. Of flannels for underwear, we imported in 1909 to the value of $99,219, while we produced them to the value of $3,464,000; that is to say, of our total consumption of these necessities of life we imported less than 3 per cent.

On dress goods we get the largest revenue coming from any one item in the schedule of woolen manufactures. In 1909 we imported dress goods to the value of $7,019,248.01, and we exported them to the value of $13,786, but we produced them to the value of $89,633,000; so that of our total consumption we imported a little more than 7 per cent.

The total imports of carpets and carpeting in 1909 were valued at $3,748,556 and the exports at $66,653. The value of carpets produced in the United States in 1905—the last year available—was $61,586,433. In 1900 the value was only $48,192,351. Presumably the figures for 1909, when known, will exceed those of 1905, but, on the basis of the 1905 production, we imported but little more than 5 per cent of our consumption.

The full significance of these figures is realized when we compare them with the figures of the other great nations of the world. They demonstrate how under the system now prevailing—which system we to-day are seeking to remedy—we are converting our Nation into a hermit nation, trading and living upon ourselves, with no trade or intercourse with the other nations of the world.

In the year 1909, as against our total importations of woolen manufactures of $18,102,461 and our exports of less than $2,000,000, the United Kingdom imported $47,338,664 and exported $135,404,888. Germany, as against our $18,102,461 of importations, imported $36,797,180, and against our exports of less than $2,000,000 exported $75,139,218. France, as against our exports of less than $2,000,000, exported $53,654,449 and imported $12,106,473.

The only reasonable explanation to be suggested for these remarkable figures is and must be that our woolen manufacturers have found the American market so profitable that they have chosen to monopolize it rather than to do business with the balance of the world. This explanation is made certain when we examine Schedule K and see the enormous advantage there given to the American manufacturer over his foreign competitor. The duties of that schedule are compound duties—specific and ad valorem—including those that are called compensatory; but when we work them all out to an ad valorem basis on the actual importations of last year we find there is revealed that which was concealed, and we know the tremendous advantage given to the American manufacturer. The rate on woolen and worsted cloths is thus shown to be an average ad valorem rate of 97.27 per cent; on blankets, an average of 73.42 per cent; on flannels for underwear, an average of 103.87 per cent; on dress goods, an average of 102.85 per cent; on wearing apparel, an average of 81.31 per cent; on carpets, an average of 60.66 per cent. But these figures, startling as they are, do not reveal the full iniquity of this schedule as it is written. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has talked much of the clothing of the poor people, and yet this law for which he and his party stands sponsor is so arranged that the clothing of the poor is taxed higher than the clothing of the rich. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When we turn to the item of cloths, for instance, we find a system of dividing cloth into three classes. The most expensive cloth last year had an import unit value of $1.07 and carried an ad valorem rate of 96.02 per cent. The second class of cloth, with an import unit value of between 59 and 60 cents, increased its ad valorem rate from 96.02 per cent to 123.55 per cent, while the third class, the cheapest, with an import unit value of only 35 cents, was and is taxed by the present law an ad valorem rate of 144.05 per cent.

The result of this discrimination against the poor and the poorer classes was that practically all the revenue derived last year from the duties on cloth came from the more expensive cloths. For instance, class 1, valued at more than 70 cents per pound, yielded $5,827,776.89 of revenue. Class 2, valued at less than 70 cents and more than 40 cents a pound, yielded $274,246.50, while class 3, the cheapest, with an enormous rate against it, brought in revenue to the Government but $2,111.

The same thing is true in reference to the item of dress goods. Of these goods weighing over 4 ounces per square yard and valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, the ad valorem rate last year was the prohibitory rate of 154.35 per cent and the importations amounted to but $74; the same fabric valued at more than 40 and not more than 70 cents per pound, the ad valorem rate was reduced to 120.47 per cent and the importations increased to $268,021; the same fabric valued at more than 70 cents per pound had an ad valorem rate reduced to 101.88 per cent and the importations increased to $2,432,597.

Such discriminations as these run throughout the entire law. The rates on the cheaper and less expensive fabrics—the clothing of the poor—are throughout the law made prohibitory, and this class of our people, helpless to protect themselves, are designedly left to the tender mercies of the American Woolen Trust. This is one of the reasons why the American people commissioned the Democratic Party in last November to reduce and revise Schedule K in the interest of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When we compare Schedule K with all the other schedules of the present law we can understand and appreciate the significance of the statement repeatedly made that Schedule K is the citadel of protection. We find upon further examination of it that the rate on woolen manufactures averaged last year 90.12 per cent, and that this is the highest rate on any manufactured product carried in the entire law, and higher than any article save distilled spirits, which carried an ad valorem last year of 126.12 per cent; and even in this instance of a higher rate, when we take the average rate on "spirits, wines, and malt liquors," the average is only 73.63 per cent, so that Schedule K—the woolen schedule—stands at the top, imposing upon the great necessity of all the people—woolen clothes—the highest taxes that are imposed upon any commodity in the entire Payne-Aldrich law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Sugar carries but 52.27 per cent, cotton manufactures but 56.04 per cent, silk but 53.39 per cent, leather but 32.01 per cent, wood manufactures but 11.42 per cent, while manufactured wool is taxed on an average of 90.12 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that Schedule K of the present law, granting, as it does, to the American woolen manufacturer an almost complete monopoly of the market among the 92,000,000 American people, comes near complying, if it does not entirely comply, with the common-law definition of a monopoly. The common-law definition of a monopoly is a right granted by the king or the government whereby the rights, the freedom of others in that same matter are interfered with or restrained. We care nothing for the freedom of the foreign manufacturer that the present law interferes with or restrains, but we do care for the restraint that the present law imposes against the exercise of the inherent and what ought to be the inalienable right of every American citizen to trade where and when and how he pleases. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The present law not only ignores the rights of the American people, but it likewise ignores the rights of the Treasury of the United States, for whose sole benefit the Constitution confers the power to tax. A tax that is prohibitory is not in the interest of the Government, for it yields no revenue.

PROTECTION.

I want now, Mr. Chairman, to say a few words on the subject of protection, about which the gentleman from Illinois has talked so freely and so interestingly.

I deny that the Republican Party invented or discovered protection. The claim to distinction in this regard to which the Republican Party is entitled is that it has abused the principle of protection—a principle that in its origin was designed for a beneficent purpose—and has perverted a great constitutional power from governmental ends to personal and selfish ends. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So far from the Republican Party discovering protection, the first tariff law that was ever written—July 4, 1789—written by the men who framed the Constitution under which we live, in its very first section and its very first words reads:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid on the following goods, etc.

Not only that, but every tariff law that has ever been written in the history of this country by every political party has carried protection within its rates. The protection that prior to the Civil War was carried in our tariff laws was, in the main, that protection incident to and inevitable from the levying of revenue duties upon competitive products. The Republican protection of to-day is that which comes from specific law, purposely enacted for protection, with revenue only an incident, and frequently, as in Schedule K, not even an incident.

I know but two ways of avoiding protection in this country. One is to levy no tariff duties whatever and thereby have absolute free trade, raising our revenue by some other method. The other way is to levy all our import duties on noncompetitive products. It is utterly impossible to levy a duty on a competitive product without carrying protection to the similar domestic article to the extent of the duty levied. Let the duty be laid for revenue, but the protection is there none the less. The Democratic Party has never stood for free trade—has never stood for the abolishment of all tariff duties—nor has it ever stood, in platform declaration or in legislation, for duties only upon noncompetitive articles. The Republican Party in one of its platforms some years ago made the declaration that it favored putting on the free list noncompeting articles, but they borrowed that from Andrew Jackson, who, many years ago, in 1830, recommended to the Congress in one of his annual messages that all duties be removed on noncompetitive articles, and cited tea and coffee as two of them.

I do not know that it is worth while to discuss the question as to whether tariff duties should be laid on competitive or noncompetitive articles, because that question is not now before us, but it seems to me that if we confine ourselves to a revenue rate the American consumer has no interest in it, and the only question involved is one of governmental policy. To illustrate: If we put a duty on coffee, none of it being produced in this country, the consumer pays that duty.

If the cultivation of coffee should develop so that we could produce in this country half of what we consume, and continued the same rate of duty, the rate of taxation to the consumer would be identically the same. True, the Government would not collect so much revenue as when our entire consumption of coffee was imported, but if that deficiency in the revenue could be supplied by a revenue duty on some other article the Treasury would not suffer. The fact—if it was a fact—that by reason of the revenue duty American citizens were enabled to produce coffee in this country, and thereby add to the wealth of our products, would not be due to any increase of taxation to the American consumer, for he would be paying the same taxes that he paid when all his coffee was imported. The Democratic policy, as I understand it, is to keep within revenue rates, and so long as this is done it seems to me that the American consumer, as a consumer, is not concerned whether our duties be laid on competitive or on noncompetitive products.

Mr. Chairman, I said a moment ago that the Republican Party did not invent or discover protection. While this is true, the protection for which that party to-day stands is not the protection that was in mind and in practice in the years preceding the Civil War. Henry Clay has often been referred to and described as the father of the present American protective system. He had no thought in his day that the system of protection advocated by him would be permanent, much less be trebled and quadrupled, in the twentieth century. In his great speech in defense of protection made in 1824 he used this language:

Let our arts breathe under the shade of protection, let them be perfected as they are in England, and we shall then be ready, as England is now said to be, to put aside protection and to enter upon the freest exchanges.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

His followers in this the twentieth century say, contrary to his prediction, that our country needs more protection now than ever before in its history. Andrew Jackson, Mr. Chairman, a few years after the speech of Henry Clay quoted from, in his annual message said:

A tariff of high duties designed for perpetual protection has entered into the minds of but few of our statesmen.

And Robert Toombs, one of the great Senators furnished by the State of Georgia, declared, in a speech in the Senate in 1857, that making protection the object and not the incident of tariff legislation was a principle—which has never been avowed by any political party or any of the great political men in America.

What Robert Toombs in 1857 said had never been avowed is avowed to-day by the Republican Party, but that speech was made more than 50 years ago.

To me one of the most interesting studies I have made about protection has been the disclosure of the steady growth and enlargement of protection ideals in the Republican Party since its organization just before the Civil War. As late as 1876 that party, in its platform, said this about the tariff:

The revenues must be largely derived from the duties upon importations, which, so far as possible, should be adjusted to promote the interests of American labor and advance the prosperity of the whole country.

That was a very modest declaration compared with those of later years. In 1884 the Republican Party declared that the tariff should—not be "for revenue only," but that in raising the requisite revenues for the Government such duties shall be so levied as to afford security to our diversified industries and protection to the rights and wages of the laborer.

We find from looking through the declarations of the Republican Party for a series of years that although the idea of protection in the early days was only to foster "infant industries," that along in the eighties the Republican Party shifted from the plea of "infant industries" to the plea of protection for "labor." We find the next shift was from cost of "labor" to cost of "production." It was not until 1904 that the Republican Party made its most distinct advance on protection lines. In 1904 in their platform they struck out the word "labor" and substituted the word "production," and said they demanded the equalization of the cost of "production" at home and abroad. That word "production"—the phrase "cost of production"—what do they mean? Extravagant production? Yes; its language is broad enough for that. Exorbitant incomes to the men who manufacture? Yes; the language is broad enough for that. Carried to its logical conclusion the language used is broad enough to give us a tariff without limit or bounds. But not satisfied with that declaration the Republican Party progressed still further, and in 1908 announced in its platform for the first time in all the history of that party or of any other political party the true principle of protection to be as follows:

In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

Sometimes I think, in looking over this record, that those of our Republican friends who, as I understand it, flock to themselves under the title of "progressives" have given themselves the wrong name, or else they have lost sight of the wonderful "progressiveness" of the "stand-pat" Republicans in tariff legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I submit that never in the history of this Republic has there been anything so monstrous in the way of a political principle as the declaration that this great Government shall guarantee "profits" to any man [applause on the Democratic side], and least of all that it shall single out one class alone to whom this guaranty shall be given. The laborer going out to his day's work to earn his $1 or his $2 has no guaranty of any reasonable profit to him when the cost of his tools and his living has been paid. The farmer toiling through heat and cold has no guaranty that the sunshine and the rains will come in time and in order to insure him a profitable harvest. The merchant embarking upon the sea of business has no guaranty from the Government that he will succeed and have reasonable profits at the end of the year. But under the creed of the Republican Party, in its latest avowal, the manufacturing classes, the favorites of its policy, are given the guaranty of reasonable profits, and, more than that, the manufacturers are left to determine for themselves when the profits are reasonable, for they dictate the rates that are put into the law. This guaranty of reasonable profits is not paternalism—bad as paternalism is—because the Government, under this declaration, does not propose to make these profits good by taking the money out of the Treasury and turning it over to the manufacturers. That would be paternalism. This proposition is to convert the great taxing power of the Government into an instrument whereby money is permitted to be collected by one class out of all classes in order that the one class may have reasonable profits in the conduct of its business. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen like my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] can not divert the issue that is presented by the pending bill by any discussion of rates or by any discussion of what is proposed to be permanent or temporary in our legislation. The pending bill joins issue with the Republican Party not simply upon rates of taxation, but upon the method of laying and collecting taxes. The issue is made between tariff rates levied for protection, which rates are prohibitory, and tariff rates levied for revenue and which are competitive. Upon the issue thus joined we are content to submit to the judgment of the patriotic people of the United States.

The Constitution empowers Congress to "lay and collect" taxes for the payment of debts, to provide for the common defense, and for the general welfare. The pending bill proposes that the Government shall lay, and that the Government shall collect, the taxes laid for these constitutional purposes. The present law proposes and in practice is that the Government lays the taxes, but that the manufacturer collects them. Our bill is a whole and complete exercise of the constitutional power to lay and collect taxes, while the present law exercises a doubtful constitutional power of simply laying taxes. Certain it is that the debts can not be paid nor the common defense nor public welfare be provided for unless the taxes laid are also collected by the Government.

AD VALOREM DUTIES.

The first thing, Mr. Chairman, that the pending bill does is to abolish specific and substitute therefor ad valorem duties. Many speeches have been made and many arguments have been written on the comparative merits of taxation by specific duties and taxation by ad valorem duties. The strongest argument that has been advanced in favor of specific duties is that a law laying specific duties is easier of enforcement by the administrative officers, and that there is less danger of defrauding the Government by undervaluations.

That contention, however sound and meritorious it may be, is not involved by our bill, because while we propose only ad valorem duties, the present law also imposes ad valorem duties in connection with specific duties. It is just as easy, and easier, to enforce a law with only ad valorem duties as it is to enforce a law with both specific and ad valorem duties. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The real argument that is made in favor of specific duties by our friends upon the other side is that the specific duty grants protection when protection is most needed, while under the ad valorem system the lower the price of the article and the more protection is needed the lower is the protection. The fact that ad valorem duties have this effect is, in my judgment, one of the strong arguments in their favor. If an article is worth $1—one class of it—and has a specific duty of 50 cents on it, the rate is 50 per cent, but if by reason of world changes in value that article drops in value from $1 to 50 cents, the specific duty remaining at 50 cents, the duty becomes 100 per cent. If the article drops in value to 25 cents, the duty is 200 per cent. So that, regardless of the fluctuations in price, regardless of the low price at which labor must be sold in times when products are valued low, the specific duty maintains the enormous expense of living, the enormous cost to the laborer and all other classes of the necessities of life, and deprives the people of the benefit of a world-wide reduction in value of the things they are compelled to buy, while at the same time leaving them to sell their labor and their products at the world's reduced prices.

Under the ad valorem system the duty follows the price. When the price advances, the duty is greater. When the price reduces, the duty does the same. But to my mind the great objection, the fundamental objection to specific duties, is that specific duties ever and always tax highest the necessities of the poorer classes. Here, for instance, is an article made up in different values. It is the same article. In one style it is worth a dollar, in another style it is worth 50 cents, in another style it is worth a quarter, or maybe 10 cents; and yet under the system of specific duties, the 25-cent article pays the same tax that the $1 article pays. The great virtue of the system of ad valorem duties is that it equalizes taxation.

But the equalization of taxation is not the only thing that the substitution of ad valorem duties for specific duties does. The present law, compounding specific and ad valorem duties as it does, is so framed that I doubt if there is a gentleman within the sound of my voice who knows from reading it what the rate of taxation is that he pays on the coat he is now wearing. Take a rate on cloth, say 44 cents a pound and 55 per cent ad valorem. How much is that per yard? See the classification further. If the cloth is worth between 40 and 70 cents a pound, the duty is 44 cents per pound and 50 per cent ad valorem. If it is worth over 70 cents a pound, the duty is 44 cents per pound and 55 per cent ad valorem. How many of you buy clothing by the pound? I challenge any gentleman within the sound of my voice to know what the actual rate of duty is that Schedule K imposes upon the clothing he now wears.

It has long been known, Mr. Chairman, that the collection of the revenues for the support of the Government by the levy of import duties was desirable, because the people found it an easy way to pay taxes. We pay taxes now when we buy for use and consumption, and we see no taxgatherer among us. Oftentimes we do not realize or know that we are paying taxes, and rarely ever how much we are paying. Our friends on the other side have aggravated this condition by so covering up the taxes they elect we shall pay and so concealing the high protection in the rates fixed by them that those of us who are really of an inquiring turn of mind and intelligent, and who would like to know how much taxes we are paying, can not find out except by the help of Government experts. Mr. Chairman, do you suppose or believe, if there had been brought into this House a bill providing in terms that the duty on the dress goods of those same children that my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] seemed so interested in should be 107 per cent, that he or any of his Republican colleagues would have dared to vote for it? They know this country would have scourged them from power had they done so. Yet they wanted the rate to be 107 per cent. They wanted those same children in the United States for every dollar of cost of production abroad to pay an additional $1.07 for their dresses, and so they did by indirection what they dared not do by direction. They fixed the law to read "so much per pound and so much per cent ad valorem," and nobody knew and nobody could tell how much the tax was nor how great the protection that was thereby afforded. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill makes the rate of taxation plain, and if it did no more than to wipe out the present compound rates of specifics and ad valorems and to make the rate and method of taxation so plain and simple that every man, woman, and child can know how much tax he is paying the bill would deserve the plaudits and approval of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

COMPENSATORY DUTIES.

The next thing the pending bill does is to strike out the iniquitous compensatory duties that are the leading feature of Schedule K. Schedule K is made up on the theory that the duty on first-class raw wool being 11 cents a pound, and it taking 4 pounds of raw wool to make a pound of cloth, the manufacturer shall be compensated for the duty he pays on the raw wool by what is called a compensatory duty of 44 cents per pound on his manufactured product, which is given him in addition to an ad valorem duty for protection.

Much has been written and said about an alleged coalition between the sheep grower and the manufacturer, in order that each might obtain high protection. The manufacturer, in my opinion, is in favor of a duty on raw wool only for two reasons. In the first place, in so far as that duty gives him the support and backing of the woolgrowers of the United States for the protection he wants on his finished product, he favors it. But more than that, he favors it because this 44 cents a pound alleged compensatory duty is largely not compensation, but protection to him.

To begin with, there is no warrant for the claim that it takes 4 pounds of raw wool to make a pound of cloth, and to the extent that it does not take that much the compensatory duty is protection.

In Senate Document No. 440, Sixty-first Congress, second session, on "Tariff on wool and wool goods," submitted by Senator WARREN, who can not be charged with being indifferent to the interests of the woolgrower or the wool manufacturer, the following table, showing the shrinkage in imported wools for the year ending June 30, 1909, is given:

First-class wool, according to this report, shrinks 42 per cent; second-class, 30 per cent; third-class, 34 per cent; and domestic wool, 60 per cent.

Under this table, showing the actual shrinkage, 100 pounds of first-class wool will yield 58 pounds of scoured wool. Assuming that scoured wool loses 25 per cent in the process of manufacture, we have a deduction of 14.5 pounds, leaving net 43.5 pounds. The compensatory duty is on the theory that there will be but 25 pounds of finished product. Instead, therefore, of a ratio of 4 to 1, as the laws say, the ratio is $2\frac{6}{17}$ to 1.

By the same calculation 100 pounds of domestic wool will yield 30 pounds net of manufactured products. And so, if any gentleman will take the time to work it out, he will see that the manufacturer gets a large part of this so-called compensatory duty as pure unadulterated protection.

But that is not the real iniquity, and by no means all the iniquity, of this same compensatory duty, because the law is so framed and construed and enforced that the manufacturer gets this 44 cents a pound compensatory duty even though his so-called pound of manufactured wool has not one-tenth of a pound of wool in it. If his product contains any wool, he collects the compensatory duty upon the theory that the entire product is of wool. This is one of the most glaring outrages in the entire schedule. I recall well, over at the other end of the Capitol, when this very law was being considered, that gifted son of Iowa, late our colleague in this House, Mr. Dolliver, whose untimely end we all mourn, made a strong appeal that this compensatory duty should at least be limited to the amount of wool actually in the product upon which the compensatory duty was asked. [Applause on the Democratic side.] His plea was spurned, and the manufacturer given the unwarranted and unjust protection that he asked for.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. I should like to inquire if there is not another element of protection there to the manufacturer that arises out of the by-product in the preparation of the scoured wool for actual use, which he gets in addition to the 44 cents?

Mr. BRANTLEY. An enormous advantage and profit, and I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to it. It is estimated generally, I believe, that in the process of manufacturing a pound of scoured wool there is a waste of 25 per cent, but that waste is in itself a product that has value, and upon that the manufacturer gets his protection as well as the value of the waste—a further advantage under this compensatory system.

OUR PROCEDURE.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in fixing our rates in this bill we have borne in mind that the instructions of the Democratic Party in its last platform were that we should make "substantial" reductions in all the necessaries of life, and "gradual" reductions in all other schedules, looking to a revenue basis, and so we have cut the present average rate of 90.12 per cent on manufactured wool down to a little more than an average of 42 per cent ad valorem, and we have cut the average rate of 44.18 per cent now existing on raw wool down to a flat 20 per cent ad valorem.

We have endeavored to alleviate existing conditions to the extent of making the reductions we have made. Whether the figures we have named prove in practical operation to be too low or too high is a matter of detail that can only be determined by putting them into actual operation. The real reform we contemplate is not confined merely to the reduction of the enormous rates of duty now existing, but to the revision of the entire system of collecting those duties.

We were compelled to rely and did rely upon the estimates of our experts and the governmental experts that the figures named by us would yield approximately on manufactured wool and raw wool as embraced in Schedule K $40,000,000. We felt that Schedule K, as we framed it, should realize that much money in order to provide sufficient revenue for the Government. We know from practical experience that last year under the present enormously high rates, with a population of 92,000,000 people, Schedule K on manufactured woolen products yielded but $20,775,820.76, while in 1896, with a population of perhaps 75,000,000 people and under the very low rates of the Wilson law, manufactured goods under Schedule K yielded that year a revenue of $23,121,474—$3,000,000 more than the Payne law yielded last year. We therefore know that lower duties than now exist will increase the revenue.

We have not been unmindful of the interests of all parties affected by tariff legislation. We have no war to wage against any legitimate industry. We wish to encourage them all. In the matter of labor cost, I think that is taken care of in the rate fixed by us on manufactured products. I do not know of anyone who can speak authoritatively and positively and certainly as to what the labor cost is. The gentlemen who are chiefly interested, as they say, in protecting this labor cost furnish us the least information about it. I read from the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of two years ago the statement of Mr. William Whitman, president of the National Association of Woolen Manufacturers, on labor cost, as follows:

> We should have been glad to have furnished you with information relating to the comparative cost of production of woolen goods in foreign countries and the United States, but that is unobtainable.

But we are not left entirely in the dark as to what this labor cost is, because in a report made by the Labor Commissioner, Mr. Carroll D. Wright, in May, 1892, he states the labor cost of producing woolen fabrics in the United States to be 20.89 per cent of the total cost of production.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield the gentleman such further time as he desires.

Mr. BRANTLEY. In England the testimony before the British Tariff Commission in 1905 shows that the labor cost of producing woolen fabrics ranges from 14 to 24 per cent of the total cost. If we take the lowest English cost, 14 per cent, and deduct it from the American cost of 20.89 per cent, we have a net difference of labor cost of less than 15 per cent. If we take the highest English cost, we have a lower labor cost in this country than in England. If we take an average or a medium between 14 and 24 per cent—say, 19 per cent—we have a net difference in labor cost of less than 2 per cent. If we assume, Mr. Chairman, that labor in England does not cost anything, we have still only the American labor cost of a little more than 20 per cent to provide for, while the pending bill affords a net rate for the manufacturer—deducting the per cent of duty that he pays on his raw material—of between 30 and 35 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So, that under any authentic estimate that has been made of the difference in labor cost in this country and abroad, the pending bill is more than ample to cover. The rates fixed in the bill we believed to be necessary, according to the best information we could obtain, to provide the needed revenue for the Government. We designed them to be not only revenue rates, but also competitive rates, and there we draw the line between our policy and the Republican policy. There we join issue with them in favor of competitive rates as against prohibitory rates.

The chief beneficiary under Schedule K as written, the American Woolen Manufacturers Association said through its president, Mr. Whitman, in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee two years ago, that notwithstanding the enormous rates given to woolen manufactures—running from 100 to 150 and 200 per cent on the foreign cost—that this business was not protected, and that the then existing law—the Dingley law—was not a protective law and could not be protective unless all importations were forbidden. The present law adopted Schedule K of the Dingley law, so that his criticism applies also to the Payne-Aldrich law, and we thus have a clear Republican definition of what is meant by a protective tariff.

We draw the line against Mr. Whitman's idea and this Republican policy of protection. We fix rates that we believe will be competitive, that will be fair to the American manufacturer, that will allow him to compete in this market upon equal terms, the foreigner having no advantage over him by reason of cheaper labor cost, and we let him win and hold this market by the superiority and excellence of his productions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

PROTECTION IN THE BILL.

Mr. Chairman, for my own part I do not deny, nor attempt to deny, that the rates fixed in our bill carry protection. In the first place, we were not called upon under our party platform to wipe out all protection. We realize that we can not in this country go at one jump from one extreme of high protection to the other extreme of strictly a tariff for revenue without upsetting business, producing disaster, and causing serious financial troubles, and so what we have undertaken to do has not been to wipe out all protection, has not been to abolish all tariff duties, has not been to go to free trade, but simply to make substantial reductions from existing rates, and that our bill does. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's reasoning is clear and lucid, and is extremely interesting. I have endeavored to follow him as to the labor cost and would like to ask him if he has looked at this question from the viewpoint of the worker in the industry affected rather than from the viewpoint of the man criticizing the manufacturer? In other words, the gentleman admits, as I understand, that the labor cost is less in foreign countries than it is here.

He differs with gentlemen upon this side as to the percentage of difference. I think it is higher in favor of the foreign manufacturer than the gentleman thinks it is. I ask the gentleman whether this reduction of duty will not, by reason of foreign competition, depress the employment of the man in the mill and bring about that very period of disaster to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have stated that in framing our bill we have endeavored to take into view and consideration all interests to be affected by our proposed legislation. In my judgment, when lawmakers come to write a tariff law affecting a given manufacture, where the raw material of that manufacture is produced in this country and is itself a large industry, they have four factors to take into consideration in fixing the rate of taxation. They must consider, first and primarily, the Government of the United States and its need for revenue. They must consider, second, the consumers of this country and see to it that they are not unduly burdened and oppressed by taxation. They must consider, third, the producer of the manufactured product and his labor and employees. And they must also consider, fourth, the producer of the raw material and his labor and employees. We have undertaken in framing this bill to consider all the interests involved, and to fix rates that, in the light of all the information we had, seemingly to us take care of all interests.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Assuming that these figures are accurate, does not the gentleman think it would be disastrous to at least a portion of the country, and to that extent to the whole of the country, if the wages of a wool sorter in the United States, being $15.50, were put in competition with the wages of a wool sorter in Germany, who receives $3.75 for the same amount of work for the same number of hours of employment? Would not that be disastrous to industry in this country?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, that is an irrelevant question because we have no facts to sustain it. Of course, there is not a true American citizen—there is not an American Congressman whatever his party—who does not at all times stand for America and the American people, including, of course, American labor, and we of the Democratic Party have not forgotten American rights in the rates we have fixed in this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are protesting against the unjust taxation of the very laborer that my friend is inquiring about.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is that laborer who in the last analysis will be affected. Earning the wages I have indicated, our workmen could not stand in competition with those who obtain the lower wage in foreign countries.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Oh, my good friend has put up a man of straw to knock down. There is nothing I have said that makes his inquiry or suggestion at all relevant. Now, Mr. Chairman, I said we attempted to make our rates in this bill competitive, and also that I made no denial of the fact that there is some protection in the bill. Our party platform, as I have said, did not command us to write out all the protection in the present law at one time. But, in addition to that reason for the protection in the bill, I said some moments ago that you could not impose a tax or duty on a competitive article, I care not how low or how strictly you impose it for revenue, that is not in and of itself a protective rate to the domestic article of like kind. I can not state that proposition any stronger or so strongly or so clearly as it was stated by President James K. Polk in his message to the American Congress that framed the Democratic Walker tariff of 1846. He used this language:

> If Congress levy a duty for revenue of 1 per cent on a given article, it will produce a given amount of money to the Treasury, and will incidentally and necessarily afford protection or advantage to the amount of 1 per cent to the home manufacturer of a similar or like article over the importer. If the duty be raised to 10 per cent, it will produce a greater amount of money and afford greater protection. If it be still raised to 20, 25, or 30 per cent, and if, as it is raised, the revenue derived from it is found to be increased, the protection or advantage will also increased, but if it be raised to 31 per cent and it is found that the revenue produced at that rate is less than at 30 per cent, it ceases to be a revenue duty. The precise point in the ascending scale of duties at which it is ascertained from experience that the revenue is greatest is the maximum rate of duty which can be laid for the bona fide purpose of collecting money for the support of government. To raise the duties higher than that point and thereby diminish the amount of money collected is to levy them for protection merely and not for revenue.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the difference between our bill and the present Payne law is that we have written our rates for the purpose of revenue and purposely made them competitive, while the rates of the present law were written primarily for protection and are purposely made prohibitory.

Further, Mr. Chairman, President Andrew Jackson, in his fourth annual message, urged that—> the whole scheme of tariff duties be reduced to a revenue standard as soon as a just regard to the faith of the Government and to the preservation of the large capital invested in establishments of domestic industry will permit.

This is the identical view expressed in our last Democratic platform. The declaration there is to reduce all tariff rates to a revenue basis, making our reductions to this end substantial and gradual, thereby showing regard for existing conditions. President Jackson, who believed in a tariff for revenue, also said:

> The general rule to be applied in graduating duties upon articles of foreign growth or manufacture is that which will place our own in fair competition with those of other countries, and the inducements to advance even a step beyond this point are controlling in regard to those articles which are of primary necessity in time of war.

He thought, as we think, that the rate should be competitive, and the rule he laid down is the rule we have followed.

DEMOCRACY AND LABOR.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think it necessary for me to consume the time of the House to demonstrate that the Democratic Party from time immemorial has regarded and stood upon the proposition that in all tariff legislation American labor must be provided for. In our platform of 1884, for instance, we declared for a reduction of the rate of taxation, and said:

> The necessary reduction can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country.

The party made the same declaration in the platform of 1888, and then favored a fair and careful revision of our tax laws, "with due allowances for the differences between the wages of American and foreign labor."

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the contention of our friends upon the other side that the American manufacturer in this the twentieth century, with all our progress in arts and sciences, with all the advanced civilization we enjoy, with all our wonderful inventions and labor-saving devices, can not live unless we give him 100 per cent advantage over his foreign competitor can not be maintained. To maintain it is to reflect upon our skill, our intelligence, and our industry, and it seems to me is to give the lie to all our boasted superiority over all the nations of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

DOLEFUL PREDICTIONS.

Mr. Chairman, our friends upon the other side in their minority views have indulged in some doleful and gloomy forebodings as to the effect of our bill, if it becomes a law. They tell us that if this bill becomes a law all the woolen mills will close and all the shepherds will turn out their flocks to die, and that the bill will bring ruin and disaster upon the entire country. I see my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] before me. I believe his name appears to these gloomy and direful predictions in the views of the minority of the committee. I would suggest to him and to the others that back yonder in 1846, when the Democratic Walker tariff bill was being enacted into law, there was then present in this House another gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Alexander Stewart. He, too, had gloomy and direful forebodings as to the result of the operations of the Democratic Walker tariff. He put his into the form of an amendment to the bill. He proposed to amend the title of the Walker tariff so that it would read:

> A bill to reduce the duties on the luxuries of the rich and increase them on the necessaries of the poor; to bankrupt the Treasury, strike down American farmers, mechanics, and workingmen; to make way for the products of foreign agriculture and foreign labor; to destroy American competition, and thereby establish a foreign monopoly in the American market, and by adopting the principle of "free trade" to reduce the now prosperous labor of this country to the degraded level of the pauper labor of Europe; and, finally, to destroy the property and independence of these United States and again reduce them to the condition of colonies and dependencies of Great Britain.

Mr. Chairman, it would seem our friends of to-day are not even original in the forebodings in which they indulge. Let us see what followed the forebodings which were indulged in in 1846, when the Walker tariff was being considered. In the first place, it was enacted into law and lived for 11 years. But one other tariff law in all the history of this country lived any longer, and that was the Dingley law, that lived for 12 years. What was the effect of the Walker tariff? Listen to these figures. In the decade from 1820 to 1830 the wealth of this country increased 41 per cent. In the decade from 1830 to 1840 the wealth of this country increased 42 per cent. In the decade from 1850 to 1860, during the operation of the Walker tariff, the increase in wealth reached the astounding percentage of 126.45 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BRANTLEY. With pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman tell us that, after we have lived as we have from 1860 to the present time, the wealth of the United States has increased from $1,600,000,000 in 1860 to $125,000,000,000 in 1910?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not the figures before me, but if my friend states that those are the figures, I am not prepared to take issue with him. He can incorporate them into his speech.

Mr. CANNON. But I wanted to get them in at this point.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Unfortunately, I have not the figures before me.

Mr. CANNON. But I state that that is so.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, we all rejoice at the growth of our country from 1860 until now, whatever that growth may be; but however great it is, the fact still remains that under the operation of the Walker tariff, which gentlemen at that time said would ruin and destroy this country, the wealth of the country in 10 years' time under its beneficent operation increased more than 126 per cent.

All classes and all business thrived under that tariff. During this decade, from 1850 to 1860, agricultural products increased 95 per cent and manufactured products 87 per cent. That tariff law carried a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem on raw and on manufactured wool, and under its operation the number of sheep increased from 21,723,220 to 24,823,371, and the production of wool increased from 52,516,950 pounds to 60,511,343 pounds.

If we are given the opportunity by enough votes at the other end of the Capitol, followed by approval at the White House, to put our bill into operation, we doubt not that the same happy and beneficent result that followed the operation of the Walker tariff will follow the operation of the pending bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

RAW MATERIAL.

Mr. Chairman, just a few words in reference to the duty on raw wool. The pending bill proposes a duty of 20 per cent on raw wool. Personally, I believe that raw wool should be taxed so long as manufactured wool is taxed. That is my individual opinion. I do not mean or undertake to say that all the gentlemen who agree with me in voting for this tax at this time agree on the principle that raw wool should always be taxed. The condition that confronted us to begin with was that we must raise approximately $40,000,000 from the wool schedule. We could not raise that amount of money on manufactured wool without imposing a duty that would be entirely too high, and we found that when we reached the maximum revenue rate to go higher would reduce importations, and consequently the revenue; and so this duty of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool was incorporated in the bill.

For my own part, I have no apology to make for it. I believe it ought to be there, so long as the duty is there on the manufactured product. So far as Democratic precedents are concerned, there are precedents for free wool and there are precedents for a tax on raw wool.

I take no issue with and have no criticism of those brave and loyal Democrats who, acting wtih the lights they had before them in the eighties and in the nineties, felt that the wise thing at that time to do was to make raw wool free. They dealt with the emergency that confronted them. They met the responsibility that they assumed in the way that to them seemed best. We to-day meet the emergency that confronts us, and carry the responsibility that is ours in the way that to us seems wisest and best.

The question is one of taxation, and if the revenue is needed, the tax should be levied. I do not lay down any rule that raw material at all times, in all cases, ought to be taxed. The only extent to which I go is to protest against the opposite rule, that raw material at all times and under all conditions must be free. If left to me, I would sometimes tax raw materials, and sometimes I would not tax them. But when the finished product bears a tax, and the raw material from which it is made is itself the result of an established industry in our country, I do not see how we can escape the duty of imposing a tax upon the raw material also. Otherwise we must face the charge of enacting a discriminatory law.

Every man knows that free raw material is protection to the manufacturer. I know some wise gentlemen say it is not protection, that it is merely the removal of a restriction that puts the manufacturer on an equality with manufacturers abroad, or that it is the removal of a restriction that enables the manufacturer to get his raw material more cheaply. I do not think it makes any difference to the manufacturer whether we call it "protection" or whether we call it "the removal of a restriction." It is dollars in his pocket to have his raw material free, and the name given the dollars does not affect their purchasing power.

For myself, I do not possess the ability to go before the producer of raw material—the woolgrower, for instance—and convince him that a law requiring him to sell his wool at free-trade prices to the manufacturer only to buy the same raw wool back in its manufactured state, with its value arbitrarily increased 25 or 30 or 40 per cent by a tariff tax, is a just and fair law to him. If I undertook to tell him that the tax on the manufactured wool was levied in order to get revenue, he would be apt to tell me that I could also raise revenue by taxing raw wool. Raw wool yielded more revenue last year than did manufactured wool. Raw wool throughout the history of our Government has ever been a splendid revenue producer.

If the argument is made that capital and labor are invested in the manufacture of wool and that such manufactures ought to be fostered, what answer is made to the reply that capital and labor are also invested in wool growing, and that without wool the factories are worthless? Is not the laborer who tends the flock and shears the sheep entitled to the same consideration as the laborer in the factory? For my own part I do not know of any reason why there should be a discrimination between the laborer in one industry and the laborer in another industry. [Applause.] I undertake to say that where there is a manufactured product, the production of the raw material of which is in itself an industry in this country, if the necessity exists to tax the manufactured product, the same necessity exists to tax the raw material.

I said a few moments ago, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], that where that state of affairs exists there are four factors to consider in fixing the rate of duty. They are (1) the Treasury; (2) the consumer; (3) the manufacturer; and (4) the producer of the raw material.

If, upon the contrary, we have a manufactured product in this country, as in the case of rubber, where the crude rubber is not produced in this country, then we have but three factors to consider—the Treasury, the consumer, and the manufacturer. In that case it is merely a question as to where we can get the most revenue, and whether it is better to reduce the rate on the manufacturer's article and thereby increase the revenue or whether it is better to let the rate on the manufactured article remain the same and tax the manufacturer by putting the duty on his raw material. The question is one of revenue and of policy.

My own theory is, as I have endeavored to state it, that where the article is competitive the rate must necessarily be protective, whatever the amount, and that fact I can not overlook in considering the producer of the raw material. I would not lay a rate except for the purpose of revenue; but in the case of wool, being compelled to raise revenue from Schedule K in order to support the Government, I would first estimate, as we did, the total amount of revenue that should be raised, and then I would raise that revenue by revenue rates, apportioned between the raw material and the finished product, so that the consumer would not be overtaxed, the Treasury would have the revenue it needed, and, as President Polk expressed it, whatever advantage resulted from the levy of the revenue tax would be apportioned between the manufacturer and the producer of the raw material. I do not know any other method or way by which justice and equality can be done.

If called upon to-day to define raw material, I would not know how to do it. If gentlemen say that raw material must be free, they should go one step further and tell us what is raw material. In this woolen industry the greasy wool is the raw material of the comber, but it is the finished product of the woolgrower. The tops are the finished product of the comber, but are the raw material of the yarn mill. When the yarn mill converts the tops into yarn, the yarn is its finished product, but it is the raw material of the weaver. When the weaver converts the yarn into cloth, that is his finished product, but it is the raw material of the tailor, the dressmaker, and the clothing manufacturer. If we lay down a hard and fast rule that raw material must be free, then it seems to me that in Schedule K the only item we should tax would be the ready-made suit of clothes.

Mr. Chairman, taxation should be fairly distributed so that its burdens will be borne equally. To make raw wool free while taxing manufactured wool is not for revenue, for it raises no revenue. It is for protection alone to the manufacturer and makes the burden of taxation unequal. The views I express are not new. They did not originate with me. They are as old as the Democratic Party itself, and have time and again been declared. James K. Polk, who sent the message to the Congress that framed the Walker tariff law, declared in that message that—

> Care should be taken that all the great interests of the country, including manufactures, agriculture, commerce, navigation, and the mechanical arts, should, so far as may be practicable, derive equal advantages from the incidental protection which a just system of revenue duties may afford.

He also said:

> The terms "protection to domestic industry" are of popular import, but they should apply under a just system to all the various branches of industry in our country. The farmer or planter who toils yearly in his fields is engaged in "domestic industry," and is as much entitled to have his labor "protected" as the manufacturer, the man of commerce, the navigator, or the mechanic who are engaged also in "domestic industry" in their different pursuits. The joint labors of all these classes constitute in the aggregate the "domestic industry" of the nation, and they are equally entitled to the nation's "protection."

Robert J. Walker, whose famous report was responsible for the writing of the Walker tariff, complained of the then existing tariff law of 1842 that:

It discriminates in favor of the manufacturer and against agriculture by imposing many higher duties upon the manufactured fabric than upon the agricultural product out of which it is made.

The Democratic tariff of 1846 put a 30 per cent ad valorem duty on raw wool. Every tariff law enacted by the Democratic Party from 1816 until that time imposed a duty on raw wool.

President Andrew Jackson, in dealing with the subject of the tariff in his message of 1829, said:

The agricultural interest of our country is so essentially connected with every other, and is so superior in importance to them all, that it is scarcely necessary to invite to it your attention. It is principally as manufactures and commerce tend to increase the value of agricultural productions and to extend their application to the wants and comforts of society that they deserve the fostering care of government.

In this same message he also said:

Looking forward to the period not far distant when a sinking fund will no longer be required, the duties on those articles of importation which can not come in competition with our own productions are the first that should engage the attention of Congress in the modification of the tariff; of these tea and coffee are the most important.

Mr. Chairman, even that celebrated so-called free-trade memorial of Albert Gallatin, prepared in 1831, demanded not free trade, but such a modification of the tariff—as shall be consistent with the purposes of revenue and equal in its operation on the different parts of the United States, and on the various interests of the same.

In reference to wool, the language of this report was not for free wool, but that—

The duties on wool as well as on the manufactures of wool should be considerably reduced.

Wool could not be free and manufactured wool taxed and the tariff be equal in its operations on the various interests of the country.

The Democratic platform of 1896 said:

We hold that tariff duties should be levied for purposes of revenue, such duties to be so adjusted as to operate equally throughout the country, and not discriminate between class or section, and that taxation should be limited by the needs of the Government honestly and economicaly administered.

The pending bill contains rates limited by the needs of the Government, and by taxing both raw and manufactured wool they are so adjusted as to operate equally and not to discriminate between classes or sections.

The Democratic platform of 1904 declared for a tariff—so levied as not to discriminate against any industry, class, or section, to the end that the burdens of taxation shall be distributed as equally as possible.

And further declared that in a revision and gradual reduction of the tariff we should keep in view "equality of burdens and equality of opportunities." [Applause on the Democratic side.] This bill is framed upon that sound Democratic principle.

The pending bill proposes to raise about $13,000,000 annually on raw wool. That money must be raised by taxing something. If we do not raise it on raw wool, we save the people nothing in the way of taxation, for we must tax them on something else they use in order to raise it. The Government can not live unless the people are taxed. To remit the duty on raw wool does not mean any substantial reduction of the rate on manufactured wool, for that rate has already been fixed at what we believe to be the rate necessary to raise the needed revenue from that source. The practical effect, therefore, of making raw wool free would be to donate to the American wool manufacturers the $13,000,000 that this bill says should go not to him but to the Treasury of our Government.

THE RAW-WOOL INDUSTRY.

I can not forego saying something in reference to the woolen industry of the world, because there can be no intelligent consideration of Schedule K without a knowledge of the condition of the world's wool industry.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the gentleman leaves entirely his discussion of the taxation of raw materials, to which I have listened with a great deal of interest, I want to know if I understand the gentleman's position. Is it his position that wherever a tax is placed on any manufactured article there should always be a tax on the raw material which goes into it?

Mr. BRANTLEY. The gentleman did not understand me. I said that wherever a tax was placed on a manufactured product and the raw material out of which the manufactured product was made was a large industry in this country, if the manufactured product was taxed, I thought the raw material should also be taxed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to know whether the logic of the gentleman's position would lead him to say that wherever a tax was placed on raw material there should always be a tax on the manufactured article?

Mr. BRANTLEY. I should think so, undoubtedly.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that reminds we that something has been said here about crude rubber. I understand there was imported last year something over $90,000,000 in value of crude rubber, and it came in free. The duty on manufactured rubber was for some reason, I do not know what, increased in the present law from 30 to 35 per cent. The total schedule on manufactured rubber, as I recall it, yielded only about $250,000 of revenue last year, and yet here is the raw material of which it is made of more than $90,000,000 in value that is imported free, while the rate on the manufactured product is placed so high that none of the manufactured material can come in. In my judgment this is one schedule, when we get to it, that we are going to overhaul and make some changes in. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not think the rubber schedule and the silk schedule stand exactly upon the same footing, and yet the silk schedule, no doubt, needs some overhauling itself. In the case of silk we imported free of duty last year over $60,000,000 in value of raw silk, but there were sufficiently low rates on manufactured silk that, as I recall it, we raised something like $17,000,000 in revenue last year from the duties on manufactured silk. Now, here is silk, importing $60,000,000 in value of raw material and yielding $17,000,000 of revenue on manufactured silk, while rubber imports free $90,000,000 in value of raw material and yields but $250,000 of revenue on manufactured rubber.

Mr. Chairman, I was undertaking to say, however, something about the world's wool industry. The United States, according to the statistics furnished us, from 1891 to 1910 increased its wool production 4.8 per cent and its population 50.6 per cent. South America increased its wool production 50.2 per cent and its population 28.6 per cent. Europe increased its population 9.5 per cent and decreased its wool production 24.3 per cent. Asia increased its wool production 3.6 per cent and increased its population 7.7 per cent. Africa increased its wool production 22.5 per cent and increased its population 24.5 per cent. Australasia increased its wool production 51.6 per cent and its population 28.7 per cent.

Mr. W. A. Graham Clark, a special agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor, submitted a special report on wool and woolens in November, 1908, published as House Document 1330, in the Sixtieth Congress, second session. I shall not consume the time of the House to read his report, except this one startling expression:

It seems that the world's wool growth has reached its limit.

Mr. Chairman, the figures that I have just given as to the increase in wool production and in population seem to make good or to justify that assertion. We consumed in 1910 of wool 6.80 pounds per capita. We consumed nearly one-fourth of the world's total production of wool. It is said—and, so far as I know, it is substantially true—that we are the only large wool-manufacturing country in the world that imposes a tax on raw wool, but gentlemen who make that assertion fail to state the further proposition that we are also the only large wool-manufacturing country in the world that is also a large wool-producing country. In 1910 we produced nearly 60 per cent of our wool consumption. The United Kingdom produced but 27 per cent of her wool consumption, Austria but 31 per cent of hers, France but 17 per cent of hers, and Germany but 6 per cent of her wool consumption.

It seems to me, in view of these figures, that if, as President Polk said, there is an advantage given by the levying of a revenue duty to the article upon which it is levied, in view of this condition of the wool industry of the world, there should be no objection to the slight advantage going to wool in this country by reason of the revenue duty we have put on raw wool. The question is much broader than the advantage to the woolgrower, for if it is important, as everyone concedes, for us to manufacture woolen goods and to have woolen factories in this country, it is infinitely more important for us to produce wool that can be manufactured; for in time of war, if we have the factories and no wool, we can manufacture nothing, but if we have the wool and no factories, we can build the factories and have the woolen clothes that are so essential. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I confess that I do not know just what effect our rate of 20 per cent ad valorem will have on the supposed advantage that the woolgrower has under the existing tariff. The existing tariff at 11 cents per pound and 12 cents per pound amounted last year to an ad valorem rate, so the experts tell us, of around 44 per cent, but has the woolgrower of this country advantaged to that extent? Many of them argue that they are only advantaged to the extent of possibly half that amount, and some of them say they are not advantaged at all by the present law. And why? Because, Mr. Chairman, the price of the American woolgrowers' wool is supposed to be fixed, not by the duty on raw wool but by the value of the scoured pound of wool. The present law trebles the duty on scoured wool, ostensibly in the interest of the American woolgrower, but the operation of our law is such that, although our wools shrink 60 to 80 per cent, and are wools of great shrinkage, the great shrinkage wools of other countries do not come into this country. Our rate keeps them out, so that there is imported into this country wool at 11 cents per pound that shrinks very little, and the value of the tariff to the American woolgrower is fixed, not by the duty of 33 cents per pound on the scoured wool, but is fixed by the raw wool that comes in here at 11 cents per pound, which—some of it, at least—shrinks but little more than scoured wool does. The operation of the law, then, is that the American woolgrower, as many of them state, secure no advantage under the present law. Whatever the facts may be in this regard, the value of the law that we propose is that the rate is fixed, certain and stationary, and every woolgrower and every woolen manufacturer and every worsted manufacturer will know just what the rate of duty is and just how much he is taxed.

But more than that, the woolgrower will find a new market for his wool, for wool will be used where wool should be used, and will take its rightful place where base substitutes are now employed. Moreover, should this bill prove a substantial reduction in the tariff on wool, we must remember that the world needs wool as badly and worse than we do, and will not let us have it save at a substantial price.

IN CONCLUSION.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that I have delayed the House too long with these remarks and must bring them to a close. We have found as a reason for our bill that the present law cheats and defrauds the Government of its just revenue; leaves the people clad in cheap and unfit clothing, many of them in cotton when they should have wool. We find a monopoly existing, and the inherent freedom of the American citizen to buy when and where he pleases taken from him; we find high prices prevailing, and finally we ask who is benefited? Years ago Andrew Jackson foresaw with prophetic vision what would take place under this system of ever and ever advancing tariff rates. He urged the reduction of all the rates to a revenue basis. He used this language:

In some sections of the Republic its influence—

That is, the influence of protection—is deprecated as tending to concentrate wealth into a few hands, and as creating those germs of dependence and vice which in other countries has characterized the existence of monopolies and proved so destructive of liberty and the general good.

The tendency that he foresaw is here. Wealth has been concentrated into a few hands, monopolies have been created, the spirit of dependence upon the Government has grown and grown so that our tariff rates under Republican rule have never been revised except to be raised. Some gentlemen have inquired to know why it is that under these high rates we have any importations at all. Prof. Taussig in one of his admirable books tells us that in many cases this is due to the fact that the domestic producers have failed to keep abreast of the foreign producer and high duties are primarily and oftentimes simply "props for the industrially inefficient." The goods come in because they are goods our mills do not produce.

The incentive to efficiency is gone when the Government guarantees profits without regard to efficiency. Dependent upon the Government, independence is gone and genius and courage and initiative are paralyzed.

Instead of crowding the statute books with laws against trade and commerce that no one understands, and instead of encumbering the books with court opinions about the meaning of which even our law experts differ, let us introduce the great law of competition. Let down the tariff bars, not to a free-trade basis, not necessarily, if you please, to a strictly absolutely revenue basis, but let them down to a competitive basis, and not only will the National Treasury be provided for, but monopolies and trusts can not here exist unless they be world-wide.

The pending bill is a start in that direction. The remedy for trusts and monopolies in this country is in the hands of the people themselves. It has time and again been demonstrated that they can not get the tariff reduced to a competitive basis under Republican rule. The remedy therefore is to send not only to this House a Democratic majority, but one to the upper Chamber, and to place in the White House a true and stalwart Democrat.

Mr. Chairman, the Democracy whose will we of the majority are to-day seeking to enact into law is a Democracy that loves the Constitution and has at heart the welfare of all the people. It is camped not upon the mountain top, alone with the producers, nor yet at the foot of the mountain, with none but consumers.

This Democracy of which I speak is deeply concerned for the consumer, but well it knows if our Nation becomes a nation of consumers alone it will surely die, and so it is concerned for producers also.

It is camped upon the side of the mountain, where neither the strong winds blow nor the high waters come, and it invites consumers and producers alike to come and do battle for right and justice beneath its unfurled banner of "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 60 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, are the duties in this bill protective? They are protective. In that I agree with the statement just made by the gentleman from Georgia, to wit, that any item in a tariff bill is protective save in two instances: First, when it is on the free list; and, second, when it is a noncompetitive product.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] made another statement with which I do not agree, to wit, that this bill conforms to the pledges of the Democratic national platform. The Democratic national platform of 1908 made three pledges on the tariff, namely:

First. That material reductions should be made in the tariff upon the necessities of life.

Second. Gradual reductions should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis.

Third.—

To which this bill does not conform—

Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list.

Mr. Chairman, in a way it is unfortunate that this bill, the revision of Schedule K, wools and woolens, is to have partisan treatment. If all here felt free to vote for amendments, regardless of caucus action or partisan prejudgment of any kind, the public would benefit infinitely.

For instance, believing, as I do, that the duty carried on worsteds for men's and women's wear in this bill is indefensible, that it is an outrage on the entire population, I am firmly convinced that if the Members of this House should come to understand the facts in the case a majority of the Members could no more be induced to put a duty on worsteds than they could be to put it on coal oil.

I can see where a possible defense might be made for a tariff on carded woolens.

But I can not see for the life of me how anyone in the American Congress can aid the Worsted Trust by putting a tariff on worsteds either as a frankly avowed measure of protection or under the pretense of a tariff for revenue.

I can see where a possible defense might be made for a tariff on certain yarns.

But I can not see how any man here, knowing the Worsted Trust, knowing its cruel activities in the fabric field, can back it up while it continues to twist its long strangling fingers around the throat of the American consumer.

The Worsted Trust has lowered the quality of goods that the consumer buys, lowered it to the point that clothing manufacturers have been ashamed to pass the fabrics on to the wearer. See the letter of the clothing manufacturers of Cincinnati to NICHOLAS LONGWORTH in the tariff hearings of 1909. Max Silberberg wrote Mr. LONGWORTH:

As a manufacturer of clothing for a period of almost 50 years, I can truthfully state that I never handled cloth of such inferior quality for the price as I do now. The masses, consisting of laborers, mechanics, and farmers, the real users of ready-made clothing, are receiving practically no value for their money.

The Worsted Trust has increased the price to your constituent and to mine of the clothes he wears. Note these figures: In the first five years of the trust's existence, 1900 to 1905, worsted goods for men jumped in "value" per yard from 79 cents to 95 cents—16 cents. In the same period, woolens for men, as contradistinguished from worsteds, increased only 3 cents.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is the manufacturer's price, or the retail price?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is the value at the mill.

The Worsted Trust has by stock manipulation paid out in 11 years on probably not over $15,000,000 original investment $22,000,000 in dividends, and has built up besides an establishment carrying a capital of $60,000,000, with a surplus of $10,000,000 on hand on top of that.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I can not yield.

The Worsted Trust has dominated its own field, manipulated successfully the field of its rival, the carded-woolen interest, has dictated to the clothing trade, and twisted and turned the thumbscrews on the purchaser of fabrics without stint, mercy, or conscience.

It has had the advantage of a "joker" in the raw-wool classification of Schedule K; also of a "joker" in the yarn and tops duty; also in the enormous duty on the cheaper grades of cloth; and the advantage of a prohibitive duty on shoddy, mungo, and the wastes.

It has had the advantage of employing more women and children proportionately than the carded-woolen interest and paying them on the average less.

Petted, pampered, privy at least once to the secret deliberations of a tariff-writing committee, full-fed upon the unfair provisions of the tariff, gross and greasy from the fat fried out of your constituents and mine, the Worsted Trust is not deserving of the fostering care of this Government in shape of a protecting duty, and no man on that side in his servility to the caucus, and no man on this side in his servility to partisan preconception can afford to vote against an amendment making all worsted cloths free.

I realize that there is on this side of the Chamber a loyalty to the letter of a party principle, enhanced in this instance somewhat by the knowledge that the ancient Schedule K has preserved its form through nearly half a century. But this is not a situation where tradition should have weight. I am a protectionist, one who believes in asking a common contribution from all, that we may surround a young, immature, growing industry with artificial advantages until it is strong enough to pay back that contribution through the price-lowering processes of competition. But when an industry has grown so great that it can starve, stifle, and strangle competition and turn the favor it received from the people into a bludgeon against its benefactor, then it is the business of every Republican to protect, not that industry, but the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I realize also that there is, on the other side of this Chamber, at present an over-anxious industry among the Democrats in imagining false values into the advantages of party harmony, a disposition to rush blithesomely into a caucus and beg to be gagged and bound by the un-American unit rule. There are men, many men there, who believe completely in making worsteds free. Why not vote that way? Is there any mistaken sense of loyalty to leadership that can counterbalance the plain duty of loyalty to your constituents? [Applause.] Is there any partisan profit to be derived from the method of "voting down all amendments" equal to the profit coming to the ordinary citizen in your district through voting up and in amendments that are just?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I can not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Just for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. I can not yield now, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Let me say to the younger Members here: In this House no man can serve two masters. As a rule, he can not be loyal to the caucus and loyal to his constituency. If he serves the one truly he will serve the other falsely. There is nothing in blind obedience to the caucus, my friends. It is not good legislation. It is not good representation. It is not even good politics. The cause of direct popular government is on the march. The direct primaries have come. The national political conventions of 1912 will be the last wherein nominees will be actually named. In 1916 both the leading candidates will be nominated by a direct vote of the people. And along with that reform will come the abolition of the congressional caucus as an institution.

Let us examine into the matter of worsteds.

The head and front of the Worsted Trust was organized in 1899. The basis of the new organization was found in four big mills, with a capital of $6,500,000—the Washington mills, of Lawrence, Mass., with a capital of $2,500,000; the National Mills, of Providence, R. I., with a capital of $2,000,000; the Riverside Mills, of Providence, capital, $1,000,000; and the Assobet Mills, of Maynard, Mass., capital, $1,000,000. The other mills taken in were smaller—30 in all.

The incorporation was on March 29, 1899, as the American Woolen Co., and there was an authorization of $40,000,000 preferred stock and $40,000,000 common stock. There was issued of this $20,000,000 preferred and $29,950,000 of common.

A large share of the preferred was water. All of the common was water. The preferred carried 7 per cent cumulative. The preferred pays its 7 per cent regularly. Of course the common stock has paid nothing.

With the institution of this dominating organization there began a stock manipulation which for dexterous creation of values out of nothing is probably without parallel in our rather spectacular history along that line. The larger mills, which were the basis of the combination, had a capitalization of $6,500,000. The new company had at once built up a value in preferred stock of $20,000,000, and added as an extra burden to the back of real values the further sum of $29,950,000 common stock, all of it water. Therefore, the company had produced a paper value of $49,000,000, and in a few years was counting out a net profit of 10 per cent annually upon this fictitious capital. But the process did not cease there. Nearly as soon as the new combination settled down to business it began to increase its preferred stock. This, it will be remembered, was $20,000,000 in the beginning. Through the years it increased, until in 1907 it had reached $35,00,000, and on July 16, 1909, it mounted to $40,000,000. So that within 10 years the company on its first slender value had built a structure of $40,000,000 preferred plus $29,950,000 common, or in all a paper value of $69,950,000. It had in addition a surplus on hand of $10,000,000. That is, the fixed and working capital of the company, capital fictitious and actual, in 1909 totaled $79,950,000. The net profits upon this enormous aggregate for 1909 reached about 8 per cent. And the American consumer paid the bill.

Still the common stock had never paid a dividend. Its holders, who had probably received all of it as a gift in the beginning, still possessed it as so much paper. Now they set out to give the common stock value. The management of the company was authorized to buy not exceeding 50,000 shares of common stock a year. In April, 1911 (that is, month before last), the management announced that it had bought up 95,000 shares, par $100. The shareholders by a vote approved the purchase and decided to retire the stock so purchased, so that there is now outstanding not $29,950,000 common stock, but $20,000,000. When this was done, the man who had been given common stock as a bonus in the beginning, and who still held it, rejoiced and was exceeding glad, for this gave promise of dividends on the common stock, of adding value to common stock long worthless. But the man who had purchased the later issues of preferred saw that this was paying out good money for nonproductive purposes, and it was lessening the security behind the preferred stock and giving value to pure water in the common.

When the facts were published that the Worsted Trust was so speculating and manipulating in its own stock it was recalled that formerly when the Steel Trust was accused of the same thing it resented the charge as an insult. And in April last, after the action of the American Woolen Co. in retiring its common stock in the manner related, the New York Evening Post declared that the financial public received the proposition with unanimous disapproval, because of the "utterly vicious financial theories involved."

But who really pays the bills? The wearer of the worsteds. The trust paid 7 per cent interest on $20,000,000, on $25,000,000, on $35,000,000, and on $40,000,000 preferred stock. By 1911 the company had paid in dividends to preferred stockholders $22,000,000, a sum of money greater than the originally claimed value of the properties. It came out of the pockets of the American citizen who was paying an exorbitant price for an inferior cloth.

Now, the plan is plainly to ask the American public further to contribute to give value to the common stock, to swell the enormous surplus, to continue to pay dividends on the increasing volume of preferred stock.

In that operation is there anybody here who believes that the Worsted Trust ought to have the assistance of a customs duty? To every dollar of actual value forced into the preferred stock of the trust the American consumer has contributed his share. To every dollar of actual value it is proposed to add to the common stock the American consumer will be expected to contribute from his earnings.

The 45 per cent on women's wear and the 40 per cent duty upon worsteds provided in this bill; 40 and 45 per cent upon (1) worsted cloths with cotton warps, and (2) cloths made of cotton and wool mixed in the yarn, and upon (3) fabrics that are all wool will help the trust in its performance.

There is not a man here who ought to help in the holdup. There is not a man here, who under the pretext of the necessity of revenue or for any other reason ought to vote to continue the white-knuckled hold of this industrial tyrant upon the throat of the Nation.

For I say to you that if all the chickens due on account of the infamies of Schedule K should come home to roost, this Capitol, during a revision of wools and woolens, would temporarily resemble a poultry farm.

Take the classification of clothing and combing wools in the present law. In nearly all the tariffs antedating the Civil War worsted goods had been either subject to comparatively low duties or admitted free. The worsted interest, which began to awake during the Civil War, started in early to get not only the general benefits, but the discriminations of the tariff. Look at the arrangement of the first two classes of raw wool. Clothing wool, wool for the carded woolen manufacturers, unwashed and not on the skin, bears a duty of 11 cents per pound. Clothing wool, washed and not on the skin, bears a duty of 22 cents per pound. Combing wool, wool for the worsted manufacturer, unwashed and not on the skin, bears a duty of 12 cents per pound. And combing wool, and here is the ancient joker, washed and not on the skin, bears a duty of 12 cents a pound. That is, washed wool for the cards, 22 cents a pound; washed wool for the combs, 12 cents a pound. Or, to put it another way, wool for woolens, 22 cents a pound; wool for worsteds, 12 cents a pound.

On the full-flowing tide of this gross discrimination the worsted interest swept ahead of its rival. There were 102 worsted mills in the country in 1870 with a capital of $10,000,000, and 2,891 woolen mills with a capital of $98,000,000. In 1905 there were 226 worsted mills with a capital of $162,000,000, and 772 woolen mills with a capital of $140,000,000. In 35 years the capital of worsted mills increased $152,000,000; the capital of woolen mills, $42,000,000.

During those years the woolen man was importing his wool unwashed and paying a duty of 11 cents a pound on the dirt. The worsted man was importing much of his wool washed at 12 cents a pound and getting all wool, not part dirt, part wool, for his money.

This alone would have been sufficient to hobble the carded-woolen industry. But that was not all. The marvelous compound duty, known as a compensating duty, further pushed the floundering carded-woolen interests into a situation of helpless submission. Schedule K has permitted textiles to bear two kinds of duties, an ad valorem on the cloth itself and a specific duty to compensate the manufacturer for his raw wool because it bore a duty. For example, on cloth valued at more than 40 cents and not more than 70 cents per pound the duty is 50 per cent of the value of the cloth and 44 cents per pound for the wool supposed to be in the cloth. This 44 cents was based on the claim—a claim that long has made the angels weep—that it takes 4 pounds of wool in the grease to make a single pound of cloth. Sometimes in the carded-woolen field it does take 4 pounds of wool in the grease to make a pound of cloth. But in the field of combing wools, in the worsted field, it takes about 2 pounds of wool in the grease to make a pound of cloth. So that half of the compensatory duty was a bonus pure and simple in the case of all-wool fabrics, and something more than a bonus in those fabrics made of cotton mixed—that is, cotton and wool mixed in the yarn—or of cotton warp—that is, cotton and wool mixed in the weave. Of cotton mixed, we made, in 1905, 63,197,407 square yards; of cotton warp, 182,057,061 square yards, the two together equaling in quantity the all-wool output of our country. Therefore the worsted interest has had a straight-out subsidy on all all-wool fabrics and a subsidy plus a bonus on all mixed goods. And all this over and above a protective duty.

Nor did the discrimination end there. For years a higher duty was placed on "tops" than was given yarns. This gave the worsted men the advantage in the business of tops and also permitted them to tighten their strangle on the carded-woolen men who purchased the "noils," the short fibers which come from the "tops" in combing.

Nor did even that close the chapter, which might be entitled "The Cinch of the Century." The carded-woolen trade could be further trampled by prohibitive duties on (1) rags; (2) "shoddy," which is reworked wool—and all wool—from soft woolens or worsted which was never milled; (3) "mungo," which is reworked wool from hard-spun or felted cloth; (4) "extract," which is wool fiber left after the cotton which was mixed with it in the cloth has been chemically eaten away; and (5) "flocks," the nap clipped from woolen cloth. These tremendous supplies of raw material have been barred, some of them, such as shoddy, with a philanthropic interest in the country by the worsted interest in a way to bring tears to the eyes of a convention of undertakers.

Schedule K, favoring everywhere the worsted interest, has been heaviest in its burden on those who could not buy high-priced cloths.

Note these statements; they reveal much:

(1) On the cheapest grade of cloth, $2,111 worth was imported in 1910. It paid a duty, an actual and computed ad valorem duty, of 144 per cent. The actual unit of value of this class of cloth imported was 35 cents a pound.

(2) On the next grade of cloth above the cheapest, $274,246 worth was imported in 1910. It paid an actual and computed ad valorem duty of 123 per cent. The actual unit of value of this class of cloth imported was 59 cents per pound.

(3) On the third grade of cloth, the highest of the three, $5,827,776 worth was imported in 1910. It paid an actual and computed ad valorem duty of 96 per cent. The actual unit of value of this class of cloth imported was $1.07 per pound.

The man of modest means who felt he could not purchase the higher grade of clothes has paid and paid and paid his pound of flesh. On the kind of goods he was compelled to buy the duty has been prohibitive. He has been the victim above all the rest.

As showing what has been going on in the worsted world in the value or price of particular cloths as compared with woolens, I want to give for the years 1905 and 1900 a comparison between the value per square yard of certain woolens and afterwards the value per square yard of certain worsteds. I ask that particular note be made of the tremendous jump in value in the worsteds.

Let us examine the woolen item first:

Woolen items.	1905	1900
	Cents.	Cents.
Wool cloths, doeskins, cassimeres, tweeds, indigo flannels, broadcloths, for men's wear, per square yard	69.6	66.2
Wool dress goods, sackings, tricots, lady's cloth, broadcloth, for women's wear, per square yard	40.6	38.6

Now, contrast the above increases with those in worsteds for the same period:

Worsted items.	1905	1900
	Cents.	Cents.
Worsted coatings, serges, and suitings, for men's wear, per square yard	95.2	79.6
Worsted dress goods, cashmeres, serges, and other worsted goods, for women's wear, per square yard	41.9	28.3

One may be helped to an understanding of this great increase in the value of worsteds when it is shown that on March 29, 1899, the American Woolen Co. took out its charter in New Jersey.

So far as the wage scale in the industry is concerned, the worsted branch has taken care of itself. Note in the contrasted figures below the larger proportion of women and children in the worsted branch, and the further fact that the average wage of the women in worsted establishments is $323 per annum as against $333 in the woolen branch in 1905:

Wage earners in worsted branch	69,251
Total wages in worsted branch	$26,269,787
Men, 16 years and over	29,883
Wages of men	$14,493,965
Women, 16 years and over	32,130
Wages of women	$10,379,154
Children under 16 years	7,288
Wages of children	$1,396,668

This should be compared with the same items in the woolen branch in 1905:

Wage earners in woolen branch	72,747
Total wages in woolen branch	$28,827,556
Men, 16 years and over	44,452
Wages of men	$19,850,052
Women, 16 years and over	24,552
Wages of women	$8,184,449
Children under 16 years	3,743
Wages of children	$793,055

I hold no brief for the woolen branch. But I recognize in it a victim worthy of some sympathy. It is an industry made up of many mills, scattered about the country. The worsted branch is close-knit and compact. Its whole weight goes into every blow it strikes.

Why let it drive its hard bargain longer with the American consumer? There is much and frequent expression of regard here for the average citizen. Why not take action in his behalf commensurate with our expressed esteem for him?

I think the change from the specific to the ad valorem in this bill is well. I believe that the elimination of the old four-to-one shrinkage duty is a matter of congratulation. But why stop there? The 40 per cent and the 45 per cent duty on worsteds are wrong. True, they are lower than the old duties. But why take only part of the burden off the back of the consumer? Why not take off all of it?

During the campaign in 1908 Mr. Bryan was quoted as saying that the first thing he would do if elected President would be to use all the powers of the Government to break up the American Woolen Co.'s monopoly. If this was his purpose, it was a worthy one. Mr. Bryan was not elected President, but those of his party, if not his faction, have now the majority in this House. That majority is about to write a tariff affecting the interests of that monopoly. Is it, in this hour of fulfillment of the Democratic pledge—a pledge to put trust-controlled products on the free list—is it to draw about the coarse and brutal form of that monopoly the magic circle of a protective duty? Is it to turn to one of the worst of all industrial vampires—a vampire that feeds not only upon the substance but sometimes the health of those who labor out of doors, a vampire that visits as inevitably as death every home in the Nation—is the Democratic majority to turn to the Worsted Trust and, voting down all amendments by direction of the caucus, give that trust license again to prey upon the people, again to sink its blood-sucking beak into the American consumer? [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from New York desire to consume any further time to-night?

Mr. PAYNE. I desire to go no further to-night.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 9, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we bless Thee for all the revelations Thou hast made of Thyself and for the hopes and promises of the future. Thou art an imminent God, ever working in and through Thy children. The last word has not been spoken, the last revelation has not been made. Make us, therefore, susceptible, that we may hear Thy voice, feel Thy presence, and go forward with unfaltering footsteps to larger attainments for ourselves and for all the world, and Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. KAHN, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Glasgow C. Davis, H. R. 10727, without leaving copies, no adverse report having been made thereon.

STEEL-TRUST INVESTIGATION.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be printed 10,000 extra copies of the testimony taken in each of the hearings before the special committee appointed under House resolution 148, to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890, and other acts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that he let the resolution go over until later in the day. I have quite a strong and fixed impression that it does not require action on the part of the House at all to accomplish this; that the matter has always been in the hands of the Committee on Printing; and that under the law the committee would have authority to order a thousand copies of hearings printed on its own order; and under the law, within the limit of $200 at each time the hearing is printed, which would cover more than 10,000 copies, they can get that number printed by getting a certificate from the clerk of the Committee on Printing. That leaves it so that the gentleman can have such number printed as he desires. If he prints 5,000 copies to-day and runs short of the number necessary to meet the demand, he can order more printed to-morrow by getting an order from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Under Rule XLV the Joint Committee on Printing is limited to an amount not exceeding $200 in printing any extra copies of hearings or documents.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. What rule is that?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the law.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that the special committee on pulp and paper printed a good many thousand copies of different hearings. We would order at one time 2,500 copies, or 3,000 or 4,000 copies, and, as the demand came in later, we would get another order. Of course, we had to go to the Committee on Printing, but there never was any hesitation in granting the order, and we had some control over the matter.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] says the Joint Committee on Printing. Of course, what we did was to go to the clerk of the House Committee on Printing, and he assented to it. I just suggest to the gentleman that he let the resolution go over for the present.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I saw the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] the other day, and I was impressed with the procedure suggested by him. I went immediately to see the clerk of the Printing Committee, and he notified me that it would require a resolution. There is no objection to printing this hearing. It is just a matter of procedure; that is all. I want to say to the gentleman that the demand for these hearings is so great that it would take at least this number, I think, to fill it. Nearly every Member of the House wants from 1 to 20 copies. Ten of these copies to each Member of the House would practically consume half this amount. There are requests from magazines and newspapers, and so forth, and if I know how many hearings I have, whether 5,000 or 10,000 or 1,000, or any amount in excess of 1,000, I can go ahead and make arrangements to have the hearings distributed; but if you have to go to the Printing Committee each time, and there is no Printing Committee here, it takes up a world of time that we can put in in other ways. For two days I have been trotting between one employee of this House and another, each fellow with a different idea, and all saying, as provided in Rule XLV, secure a resolution, then everything will go smoothly. I hope the gentleman will not interpose any objection.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman understands that naturally, and I have no criticism of that at all; most of the employees of the House now are inexperienced in matters of this kind and do not understand, but they have to learn sometime, and the gentleman from Kentucky is a very good instructor and might as well help us all to know what can be done.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the gentleman is correct about the unusual demand for these hearings, and something ought to be done right away. As a member of the Committee on Rules, I know there is an extraordinary demand; and now in reply to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says, that there is already authority for the printing of these extra copies, if that be true, the adoption of this simple resolution does not alter the law in any respect, but would merely be a cumulative act, and would hasten the printing of the extra copies without having to go through the routine of requests, and so forth, which he suggests. I hope he will not object to this resolution, but will allow it to go through to-day in order that we may supply the extraordinary demand.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, one time I took possession of some rooms over in the House Office Building which had been occupied by a special committee known as the Lilly investigation committee. I found in that room stacked up a great mass—tons, I should say—of hearings that had been ordered printed on the assumption that they would be used, which were still there, printed at great expense, and I ordered them thrown away or sold as waste paper, there being no other disposition to be made of them. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] undertakes to supply 10 or 20 copies of the daily hearings to each Member of this House, nine-tenths of them will go into the waste basket.

Mr. STANLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I will supply no Member of the House a single copy of these hearings unless he requests it, and in order that I might know what I was doing, in order that these hearings might not be printed and thrown away, because I realize it is a waste of public money if they are, at my own expense, not at Government expense at all if there is any expense about it, I wrote a letter to each Member of the House after these requests began to come in and said to each one that none of these hearings would be sent out except upon request, and to let me know the lowest number he could do with.

The Members replied and told me the number they wanted. These hearings have been going on now for a great number of days, and I have not sent out any of them, hardly 25 a day, and they come there and get them; and, as the members of the committee know, there are not now a wheelbarrow load of these hearings over there; not 50, probably, with the exception of the last hearing, which arrived this morning. I will give the gentleman my personal guaranty that when this hearing is over every one of these hearings will have been distributed, so far as I am concerned, and with the exception of those that go to Members of Congress the rest of them will be sent out through the mails every day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have great confidence in the gentleman, but this is only a precedent that will govern a lot of other cases, and if the Committee on Printing does have the power I think it ought to go before the Committee on Printing. Therefore I ask the gentleman not to press his request just at this time or until the committee rises this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Kentucky say to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the resolution for the present.

EULOGIES ON LATE SENATOR JOHN W. DANIEL.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House order 6.

Ordered, That Saturday, the 24th day of June, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. JOHN WARWICK DANIEL, late a Senator from the State of Virginia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 11019, a bill to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few general observations preliminary to my remarks upon the pending bill.

The great issue between the two political parties is that of taxation and expenditure. Our Republican friends have always preached and practiced the policy of high taxes, high expenditures, and high prices of all manufactured articles. Democrats have uniformly opposed unequal and exorbitant tax rates as well as waste and extravagance in the public expenditures. The controlling purpose of Republicans in levying import duties is protection to the manufacturers—giving them an absolute monopoly of the American market, thus enabling them to fix prices limited only by their greed of gain. They leave the question of revenue largely to take care of itself. The sole purpose of Democrats in imposing duties on imports is to secure necessary revenue for the Government, and incidentally to so lay these duties as to obtain the revenue with as little burden as possible to the taxpayer, and according to his ability to pay, and with as little disturbance to the business of the country as possible and without discrimination against class or section.

The effect as well as the meaning of a protective tariff is that the immense taxing power of this Government shall be constantly invoked to enable a few thousand manufacturers to sell their products to the people at more than a reasonable and fair profit. The issue now, as it long has been, is, Shall this unjust interference of the Government cease?

Mr. Chairman, the first 70 years of our national existence closed with as nearly a perfect revenue tariff as could be devised—the product of Democratic wisdom and statesmanship. All parties acquiesced in this system of taxation as wise and just. We then had a model government by a model people. All felt equally its benefits, and none were exempted by favoritism from bearing their share of its burdens. This was under the benign influence of Democratic rule. But after the war our Republican brethren administered the affairs of the Nation. They immediately began a happy affinity with the privileged class. Since then each has considered itself the true affinity of the other. The protective tariff—the king of all our evils—was gradually fastened upon this country. During all the subsequent years the sleepless monster of protection, clothed in the livery of the law, has invaded every American home and exacted its "pound of flesh." The chief underlying cause of existing economic, financial, and social ills is traceable to this partnership of the Government with crime—the protective tariff. We to-day behold the results of protection "run to seed." The predictions of Democratic statesmen, made from the beginning, have come literally true. We have seen this system, which has never laid claim to fairness, honesty, or decency, propagate colossal trusts and giant monoplies innumerable, whose forces give free rein to their unbridled appetite for gain and their wicked lust for power. Shielded by vicious class legislation, actuated by the sole motive of gain, the beneficiaries of this system, the trust, the combine, the exclusive monopoly, have for 40 years ruthlessly preyed upon the hard earnings of those who toil. The unexampled patience and forbearance of the American people under this trying ordeal of pillage and plunder reads like a story from the feudal ages in England.

Even President Taft admits in effect that we no longer have competition in American markets. Many of the manufacturers—bloated with their ill-gotten wealth, impudent from a long lease of privilege—openly boast that their lobbyists sent here have been permitted by Republican Congresses to write their respective tariff schedules, under which they fixed their own high and arbitrary prices. No wonder wealth is so unequally distributed. No wonder business conditions are so unnatural, unstable, and artificial.

But, Mr. Chairman, the people, like a slumbering giant, have finally become aroused. They have decreed, in no uncertain terms, that tariff iniquities shall be banished. The doom of protection, here and everywhere, is plainly to be seen. It has always been indefensible; it has now become insupportable. Having prevented and delayed the work of tariff reform as long as possible, our Republican friends, three years ago, with mock seriousness, volunteered to perform this important task. I then inquired how the country could expect either of the component elements of that sweet, delectable trinity—the tariff beneficiaries, the trusts, and the Republican Party—to rise up and slay the others. True, this elegant triumvirate, this e pluribus unum, comprises three nominally separate corporations, but all are operated under one and the same management. I also said that it is a travesty upon common sense to expect the Republican Party, which is the pliant tool, the shield bearer, the toady, the lackey, the flunky of protection and the trusts, to fight with them any other than a sham battle. Each is the other's keeper. They are banded together under an obligation of honor, in so far as honor can bind certain classes, for all purposes of offense and defense.

REPUBLICAN FAILURE TO REVISE THE TARIFF.

What has been the result during the past three years of so-called Republican effort at tariff reform? Their first effort was the Payne-Aldrich monstrosity. It was worse than an abortion. It was an attempt to fool the people once too often, as shown by the last election returns. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Their next step was to set up the plea that neither Congress nor the President knew anything about the tariff and that only a tariff commission had the knowledge and ability sufficient to deal with it successfully. Accordingly the last Republican Congress created such a commission. That body of excellent gentlemen has been laboring more than a year, and thus far has only been able to report on one minor schedule of the present tariff law. There are 14 schedules in all. At this rate it would take this board 15 years to lay its complete work before Congress for its action, and in the meantime the tariff extortion would go on. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can not take the tariff out of politics. It has ever been a constant and fruitful source of political controversy in all countries, and will so continue until men are no longer influenced by human nature and human avarice. This is but another characteristic Republican effort to baffle and delay the great movement for honest tariff reform. Their third and last step relative to tariff revision was to suggest and urge Canadian reciprocity. Considered alone, this bill was not equitable in several respects, but it did contain downward revision and looked toward free trade with Canada—Democratic doctrine—hence the Democratic House, supported by a minority of the Republicans, promptly passed it, without attempting in any way to play politics, and sent it to a Republican Senate, where it at times seems doomed to die a lingering death. However, I trust that the lash of public sentiment may yet drive unwilling Republicans in another body to its support. But, in any event, the fact must not be overlooked that this bill embodies fundamental Democratic principles, modestly appropriated by a Republican President, and without the united aid of Democrats, both in and out of Congress, the President's efforts would have received scant support.

Mr. Chairman, it is therefore to be seen that the three steps taken by the Republicans toward tariff revision spell "failure" and "incapacity" in box-car letters.

DEMOCRACY THE PEOPLE'S HOPE FOR HONEST REVISION.

In its entire history none but Democrats have ever willingly given this country substantial and honest relief from oppressive taxation. The representatives of that great body are here in this House to-day with honest hearts and willing hands engaged in the work of uprooting the system of highest protection known to the fiscal history of any government. The undertaking is great. The task is arduous. The opposition is powerful and insolent. Fifty years in their growth and upbuilding make the predatory interests feel securely entrenched. To dislodge them and to restore this to a government of the people will require courage, persistency, patience, and unity on the part of Democrats. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It took the English people 11 years under the leadership of Peel, Cobden, and Bright to batter down and destroy the protective-tariff system of England—older but less formidable than ours—and to establish the fiscal system demanded by the people.

Mr. Chairman, in prosecuting the work of tariff reduction, it is needless to say that Democrats will act in a spirit of fairness and justice. Every citizen alike desires to see this country thrive and prosper. No legitimate business interest will be injured or seriously disturbed. Democrats are conservative when conservatism will suffice. They are radical when radicalism is necessary to uproot some deep-seated evil that afflicts the country or to prevent its taking root. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Speaking for myself, as a Democrat, I believe that to properly revise and readjust our system of taxation so as to round out the most perfect and lasting fiscal system, and which I favor, would require a gradual reduction of the tariff to a sound revenue basis—lopping off existing inequalities and abuses, placing minimum rates, or none at all, on articles of prime necessity and universal consumption, and maximum rates on luxuries—and there should be levied an equitable and comprehensive excise or income tax to equalize the tax burden and to give elasticity and productiveness to our tax system. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The experience of most all the leading nations of the world conclusively shows that a modernized income or excise tax, combined with our other methods of taxation, makes up the fairest and most perfect fiscal system that can be devised. I predict that this country will soon come to this fiscal policy, and the sooner the better.

ITS RECORD THUS FAR.

Mr. Chairman, I now desire to discuss briefly the present work of Democratic tariff revision. We have passed the reciprocity bill, which has split the Republican Party wide open because it is based upon Democratic doctrine. As a companion measure we have passed the farmers' free-list bill, which places upon the free list all agricultural implements, boots and shoes, and other important articles of common necessity, thereby restoring them to the field of unlimited competition and saving the farmers and other classes probably $100,000,000 per annum.

We now have under consideration the woolen schedule. And I desire to say at this point, Mr. Chairman, that, unlike all Republican tariff legislation, the pending bill was not written by the lobbyists of either the woolgrower or the woolen manufacturer. No representative of the privileged class had the slightest knowledge of the provisions of this bill until after it was laid before the House Democratic caucus on Thursday last. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I may also add here that this bill is violently opposed by every beneficiary of the high rates in the present woolen schedule. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is likewise opposed by every Republican protectionist in Congress who can oppose it without losing his seat here. This bill emasculates and breaks the backbone of protection under Schedule K—the woolen schedule.

Mr. Chairman, I believe, and have long believed, that the sound economic policy and the best party policy would require the removal of all duties from the importations of raw wool. At present, however, the weight of opinion, even among those whose views are in harmony with mine, is that the long step toward free wool as embodied in this bill is more wise and feasible than to seek the total removal of the duty outright. This schedule now ranks third as a revenue producer. To strike out the $21,000,000 revenue derived from raw wool, without at the same time replacing it with a new source of taxation, would create a deficit in the Treasury. The Democrats are revising the tariff schedule by schedule. This renders it quite difficult, if not impossible, to satisfactorily make up such a deficiency until subsequent schedules, which would properly embrace the new subjects of taxation that would replace the wool tax, could be reached and considered. This course will enable the Democrats in Congress later on to substitute other subjects of taxation less burdensome than that of raw wool and place the latter on the free list.

Another reason is that the Democrats and others might be able to pass the pending bill through the Senate and thereby give the people immeasurable relief from the existing tax burdens in the wool schedule, whereas a free-wool bill would not have the same chance of passing the Senate. At any rate, Mr. Chairman, after long discussion and consideration, the conclusion became clearly apparent that the Democrats of the House, in view of the state of the Treasury, deemed it more practical and wise to deal with the woolen schedule as this bill proposes, and at the same time reiterating the Democratic policy to the effect that wool should be made free as soon as revenue conditions will permit and as soon as other subjects of taxation less burdensome can be substituted. The proposed bill lops off the extortion in the present law and places this schedule on a strict revenue basis.

THE WOOL TARIFF.

The present law undertakes to give the woolgrower and the wool manufacturer a complete monopoly of the American market, permitting them to fix their own arbitrary prices. This law is maintained upon the evident assumption that the American people will either cease to wear woolen clothing or purchase it from the American manufacturer at two and three times its fair value. In writing this schedule every device that ingenuity could contrive was resorted to to conceal the enormous protection and graft contained therein. Its peculiar classifications, its compensatory duties, its specific, ad valorem, and compound duties, its duties by the pound, its duties by the yard, and so forth, are staggering and puzzling even to an expert mind. For the purposes of the tariff wool now is divided into classes 1, 2, and 3. The tariff on class 1 is 11, 22, and 33 cents a pound, according to whether the wool is unwashed, washed, or scoured.

The duty on class 2 is 12 cents a pound on washed and unwashed and 24 cents a pound scoured, while the duty on class 3—carpet wools that do not compete with our wools—is 4 cents when valued at less than 12 cents a pound and 7 cents when valued at over 12 cents a pound. The average tariff on raw wool is 44.31 per cent. The present bill wipes out these three classes and imposes a flat ad valorem rate of 20 per cent. This is a reduction of 56 per cent of the present average duty on raw wool. The average tariff on the manufactured product under the present law is 90.10 per cent, and under the pending bill it is 42.55 per cent. This is a reduction of 53 per cent of the present average duties on the manufactured goods.

PRESENT STATE OF THE TREASURY.

I desire here to allude to the condition of the Treasury. On Tuesday of this week the excess of ordinary receipts over ordinary disbursements was $1,780,861, and for this fiscal year to date $8,656,775. The receipts from customs for the present fiscal year, up to this date, were $294,241,710. To this date last year the customs receipts were $310,445,815. This shows a decline in customs receipts from last year up to this date of more than $16,000,000. According to the same ratio of decline, it is but fair to estimate that the receipts from this source will, on June 30, the end of this fiscal year, show a falling off of $18,000,000 to $20,000,000. Save for the unexpected and abnormal increases of revenue from other sources for 1910 and also for this year, there would now be a large deficit in the Treasury.

During this and last year the increase of revenue from internal-revenue sources was entirely abnormal. This is shown by the fact that the revenue derived from the internal revenue proper for 1909 was only $246,000,000. The average annual revenue derived from this source from 1903 to 1910, inclusive, omitting the $20,000,000 corporation tax for 1910, was only $249,000,000. These average annual figures are the only safe basis on which to estimate the natural level of this source of receipts. Fluctuations, it is true, occasionally occur, as is the case with respect to this source of receipts for both 1910 and 1911. It so happens that during these two years the revenues from tobacco, distilled spirits, and other intoxicants jumped up more than $20,000,000 last year, and bid fair to do so this year, but the probabilities are that they will soon go back to their normal level. Again, the fact should not be overlooked that the miscellaneous receipts for this year have increased some $12,000,000 over those of recent previous years. This item is always uncertain. It will amount to about $60,000,000 this year, whereas it was only $45,000,000 last year and $40,000,000 the year previous, and the average receipts from this source for the past eight years were less than $45,000,000. The fact should also be noticed that on this date last year only $800,000 of the corporation tax had been paid, whereas at this time more than $8,000,000 of that tax has been paid into the Treasury. The only certain thing about receipts from customs duties is that on account of the large number of prohibitory rates they can not be reasonably expected to go higher hereafter than the amount for the present year. As to how much lower they may go can only be surmised by a glance at the great fluctuations of receipts from this source during recent years. It is equally certain that they are on a gradual and certain decline now. No one can foretell when or where this decline may stop.

To illustrate, the receipts for 1905 were $261,000,000, while for 1907 they had jumped to $332,000,000, but, characteristic of this source of revenue, in 1908 they fell to $286,000,000, a loss in one year of $46,000,000 and a difference, caused by a fluctuation between the years 1905 and 1908, of nearly $120,000,000, thus plunging the Treasury into a good-sized deficit. For 1910 the customs receipts jumped to $333,000,000 from $300,000,000 in 1909. This is largely accounted for because imports were held back awaiting the passage of the Payne bill. From all the foregoing facts and circumstances the only rational conclusion is that receipts from customs are on a gradual but certain decline, and that those from miscellaneous and other internal sources can not be expected to retain the high level to which they have jumped during this and last year. To be entirely safe, I will estimate that the recent unnatural rise in receipts from internal revenue and miscellaneous sources should decline toward their normal level to the extent of one-half, this would result in a loss of $15,000,000. From this sum deduct the present excess of ordinary receipts over ordinary disbursements, $8,656,775, and we face a deficit of $6,000,000 to $7,000,000. The inevitable situation, therefore, that must immediately and for an indefinite time confront Congress is, in effect, a depleted, and, most certainly, a depleting, condition of the Treasury.

Furthermore, this House has heretofore passed the reciprocity measure. This will reduce the revenues some $8,375,000. We have also passed the farmers' free list bill. This will reduce the revenue $11,000,000. In passing these and other tariff bills through the House we can only assume that the Senate will be wise and patriotic enough to put them up to the President, who would for like reasons approve them. Upon this basis, therefore, we must estimate the future state of our revenues. Our Republican friends are anxiously watching for a chance to parade before the country the cry that this Democratic House has passed bills which, if enacted into laws, would knock an immense hole in the Treasury and compel the Government to issue millions of bonds. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], for example, stated that the free-list bill would deprive the Treasury of near $50,000,000.

I here read a list of the imports and duties for the year ending June 30, 1910, under the Payne law, and also the pending bill—the latter estimated:

Average rates, imports and duties under present law and the proposed law.

Items.	Present act—Results for year ending June 30, 1910.	Proposed act—Estimated results for a 12-month period.
Raw wool:
Imports	$47,678,293.20	$66,991,000.00
Duties	$21,128,728.74	$13,398,200.00
Average unit of value, per pound	$0.186
Equivalent ad valorem rate, per cent	44.31	20.00
Manufactures of wool:
Imports	$23,057,357.78	$63,831,000.00
Duties	$20,775,820.76	$27,158,000.00
Equivalent ad valorem rate, per cent	90.10	42.55
Total revenue	$41,904,549.50	$40,556,200.00

This bill will thus give the people incalculable relief from unjust burdens of taxation and at the same time contribute the usual sum to sustain the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, in 1910 this country produced 328,110,749 pounds of wool and imported 256,606,638 pounds. The domestic consumption of raw wool and wool equivalent of fabric for 1910 was 628,718,934 pounds. We consume more than one-fifth of the world's total output of wool, which last year was 2,854,384,000 pounds.

EFFECT OF WOOL TARIFF SINCE 1867.

Mr. Chairman, at the close of the war our unwashed domestic wool was worth about 40 cents a pound. Then it was that the woolen manufacturer approached the woolgrower and convinced him that if a combination of the two interests could write into our tariff laws a wool schedule containing prohibitory rates upon both raw and manufactured wool the woolgrower would be able to permanently maintain these war prices and the manufacturer could not only maintain but increase his. The result was the wool tariff of 1867, a network of compound and compensatory duties. The Republicans have transmitted that law to the Payne Tariff Act, with slight modifications. We behold that law to-day in all its hideous infamy, hoary with age, but with an ever-increasing appetite for pelf. Did the act of 1867 yield to our sheep grower the expected results? No! The years went on. Wool gradually declined in value, so that after 24 years' experiment—1891—the prices had fallen off one-half and the number of sheep east of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers had declined in numbers one-half. In 1892 Mr. S. N. D. North, notorious as a tariff lobbyist for the woolen manufacturers, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, gave a careful comparison of prices of wool in the Boston and London markets for each year from 1867 to 1891, and a general average showed little difference between the two markets during all this time. Sheep in this country declined from 50,000,000 in 1884 to 43,000,000 in 1891. In Texas alone they declined in numbers from 4,281,812 in 1891 to 2,852,269 in 1894, and this occurred under the McKinley law. In 1891, after 20 years of protection, we were obliged to import 129,303,648 pounds of wool. From 1891 to 1909 the domestic supply of wool only increased 14,000,000 pounds, about 4½ per cent, while our population increased 46 per cent, so that we now have to import 260,000,000 pounds of wool, almost as much as we produce. Republicans, refusing to give the panic credit for any of the loss, insist that the number of sheep declined from 45,000,000 in 1894 to 36,800,000 in 1897 on account of the Wilson tariff. Then how do they explain the decline of sheep from 50,360,000 in 1885 to 42,600,000 in 1889 under a high tariff? And how do they explain the decline from 63,965,000 in 1903 to 45,170,000 in 1905 under the Dingley law? My figures are taken from the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture. Again, how do they explain the fact that during the Wilson law a world-wide panic caused the prices of wool to first decline in Europe corresponding to the later decline here? And finally, how do they account for the fact that during this same time the value and numbers of other live stock, including cattle and hogs, and I should add cereals, suffered a decline corresponding to that of sheep? Will they contend that the Wilson tariff was responsible for all these like conditions? If so, they "state themselves out of court." The whole truth is that while protection has at times been of certain temporary benefit to the woolgrower, but at a tremendous expense to the American people, yet, taken as a whole, it has brought him no permanent advantage. He has lost far more by the enhanced price of the manufactured product than he has ever gained by protection. To illustrate: When the woolen manufacturer, under the present law, buys the farmer's unwashed wool of the first class the farmer is supposed to get the benefit of his 11 cents a pound tariff. But what becomes of it? Another section of this same tariff law provides that on ready-made clothing the duty per pound shall be four times the duty imposed upon a pound of unwashed wool of the first class and 60 per cent ad valorem. The farmer gets his wool back in the form of a suit of clothes with this enormous tariff added to what he would otherwise have paid.

Mr. Chairman, the American woolgrower will finally realize that he is being used by the manufacturer. He will find that the sheep industry, as to wool, is a migratory one, and that no artificial tariff prices, however high, will or can materially affects its permanent development or decline. For hundreds of years Spain produced all the fine wools for the world. Later Germany excelled. At present Australia has the largest market for fine wools. In this country the sheep industry has drifted first from the Eastern to the Middle Western States, and thence to the mountain States of the Northwest. Sheep as a wool industry always give way to agriculture wherever the lands make the latter profitable and people are at all numerous. Its history shows that this industry has traveled from country to country and from continent to continent.

The world's market is the chief factor in fixing the price of our domestic wools. The American woolen manufacturer, however, is a strong secondary factor. Different soils and climates and pasturage produce different classes of wool even from the same breed of sheep—the wool differing in fineness, soundness, fiber, strength, evenness, and length. Our woolgrower depends solely upon our home manufacturer to purchase his wool. The latter, before buying his raw wool, first takes his orders for cloths. These call for an immense variety as to finish, style, ingredients, and so forth. Our manufacturer goes abroad, where he can have the world's varieties of wool from which to make the most suitable selections—both as to class and price—with which to intermix our American wools and thereby fill his orders more acceptably. After buying such of our home wool as he needs or can utilize for this purpose, he informs the home woolgrower that he does not need any more of his wool. The result is stagnation and depression in the domestic wool trade, much of the time resulting in sales to our home manufacturer at prices virtually on the world's level. In the meantime our home manufacturer, having a monopoly of the market, compels every citizen to pay almost two prices for his finished product, supposedly made of wool, but in fact often composed of adulterants, such as cotton, shoddy, mohair, camel's hair, horsehair, and other kinds of hair than that of the sheep.

Mr. Chairman, I have here a very entertaining and carefully prepared statement by Mr. S. N. D. North, who, as I have stated, has been for more than a quarter of a century notorious as a representative and a lobbyist of the woolen people. He has written a book on the entire subject and the various phases of wool production and wool manufacture. In this statement before the Dingley Ways and Means Committee he is supposed to have been candid and frank, and I send it to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the marked portions on each one of the two pages opened.

Mr. REILLY. What pages are they?

Mr. HULL. Pages 1650 and 1651 of volume 2 of the Tariff Hearings of 1896–97.

The Clerk read as follows:

Never until he had experience under free wool did the manufacturer realize the full extent of the disadvantage he suffers by reason of the wool duty and the impossibility, by any compensatory duty, of fully offsetting these disadvantages. In order that this fact may be brought home to you, we have briefly summarized these disadvantages.

(1) In the selection of foreign wools the duty restricts him within the narrowest limits, and thus excludes him from many of the blends from which the foreign manufacturers get the best results. His choice is necessarily confined to the comparatively small supply of light-shrinkage wools. He is thus excluded from many of the fine wools, which reach the markets in a very greasy condition. The range of product open to him is thus greatly limited.

(2) This concentration of American purchasers upon a comparatively small class of foreign wools increases the price of those wools in comparison with the price of the much larger assortment of other wools offered, and thus the duty directly adds to the cost of the wool a material sum in addition to the actual duty paid, and adds correspondingly to the cost of manufacture. The course of the markets under free wool has indicated that the enhancement of the price of the light-shrinkage wools, by reason of the concentration of American competition upon them, is in the neighborhood of 4 cents a pound.

(3) The wool duty not only restricts the choice and adds to the price of the American manufacturer, but it, of course, correspondingly enlarges the choice and cheapens the price of the wools of the foreign manufacturer. The disadvantages of the American manufacturer thus become distinct advantages, added to all the other advantages which the foreigner naturally possesses over the American.

(4) All the restrictions and limitations of the old law upon the importation of wool were put there to embarrass and impede the manufacturer in his choice of wools. They do have that effect, and are thus an additional disadvantage under which he labors and for which he gets no compensatory equivalent. Nothing akin or equivalent to them appears anywhere else in any tariff schedule. They imply that the whole business of importing wool is a fraud or tainted with fraud. As a matter of fact, there is no branch of importing where the business is more honestly done or where the opportunities for fraud are so few. Nearly all foreign wools are now bought and sold at public auction and are put up without reference to the American market. The expense of repacking these bales is sufficient to bar the attempted fraud which all these restrictions contemplate.

The wool manufacturer has moved too fast and too far ahead both at home and abroad. The handicap it was possible to offset by compensatory duties 30 years ago, if restored in all its old rigors, will cripple and repress the manufacture, will stop its diversification, will confine it in a strait-jacket to the detriment of all concerned, and more especially to the injury of the American woolgrower.

The great and important fact is that as the manufacture has now developed here the use of foreign wools has become indispensable. Any duty on wool, the purpose of which is to exclude and prohibit its importation, will restrict the American manufacture to such fabrics and effects as can be produced from domestic wools, and the result of such restriction will be to enormously increase the imports of foreign wool in manufactured form, irrespective of the duties you may impose. This enormous development in the world's wool supply, of which I have spoken, has re-created the art of manufacture. Our foreign competitors, free to pick and choose in this vast and varied assortment of wools, each variety especially adapted to some special purpose, will control this market in the fancy fabrics unless Congress permits them to be met and matched by the use of the same wools.

Notwithstanding the high duties on wools maintained from 1861 to 1894 there never was a time in our history when the home supply was so insufficient in comparison with these special requirements. The proportion of fine wools grown here has been steadily decreasing, and is certain to continue to decrease. The farmer has learned that there is greater profit to him in raising the mutton sheep.

In the second place, our friends the woolgrowers entirely misapprehend the effects of these imported wools upon their own industry, and seek here legislation which is devised for their own injury.

The largest quantity of clothing and combing wools ever imported into this country under a duty was 44,000,000 pounds in 1892. That quantity of wool did not displace a single pound of domestic wool in the manufacture. It permitted the manufacture of certain goods in which domestic wool was used in conjunction with the foreign which could not otherwise have been made in the United States under the McKinley tariff.

No American manufacturer buys foreign wool for any purpose which he can accomplish equally well by the use of domestic wool. No man advances the money to pay wool duties 8 or 10 months before he can hope to get it back in the sale of his goods who can make these goods out of materials at hand. In a word, this wool was not used to displace American wool. It did not displace it, and the importation of it increased the market for American wool. There has never been a year, until 1893 and since, when the requirements of the domestic manufacturers did not exceed the domestic wool supply. Make this tariff bill right and the domestic manufacturer can promise the woolgrower a quick market for all the raw material he can grow for many years to come.

Mr. HULL. It is seen that, after all, our woolgrower does not directly compete with foreign wools to the extent supposed, for we have to send abroad for nearly one-half of the wool we consume in any event, and these foreign purchases are largely composed of classes that we do not produce, but which are suitable to mix with our domestic wool in order to turn out goods of the most desirable finish, style, and price. Mr. Chairman, the prices of wool are higher in London—the world's market—to-day than they are in Boston. I should like to pursue this inquiry further, but time forbids. Existing conditions confirm one in the conclusion that the revenue rate on wool proposed in the pending bill is amply justified. I go further, Mr. Chairman, and say that, when obtainable, free wool would soon redound to the benefit of every American citizen, regardless of his business or occupation. If this happy result could be had, the sheep grower east of the Mississippi could continue to realize his chief profit out of mutton sold, and our manufacturer could import his additional wool less the present exorbitant tariff, which greatly enhances the cost of manufacture and still more greatly enhances his price of the finished product sold to the American people without competition.

PRESENT TARIFF ON WOOL MANUFACTURES.

It would require four combined languages, containing the greatest power of expression, to adequately depict the inequalities, abuses, monstrosities, and outrages embraced in the existing woolen schedule. The aggregate of compound and other rates in the manufacturer's end of the schedule are more than mountain high. The manufacturer must exclaim, as did Lord Clive before a committee of the English Parliament, "My God! I am surprised at my own moderation." And yet, Mr. Chairman, next to eatables and cotton goods, woolen articles are the most universal necessaries. Next to hunger, protection from cold ranks in the scale of human necessity. What are human rights and human liberty worth in this country if, in order to enrich a few thousand persons, 90,000,000 people must wear cotton or very light wool and shoddy clothes and shiver through the depths of rigorous winters because of their inability to pay a tax of 96 per cent on an all-wool suit of clothes? Why not, while treating the manufacturer fairly, compel him to be content with fair competition and with a reasonable profit?

Mr. Chairman, a glance at the facts shows that real competition in woolen goods is entirely shut out and prohibited by the present law. The value of our domestic worsted and woolen manufactures in 1909 was $419,826,000, but the total value of our domestic consumption of raw wool and wool equivalent of fabric was for 1910 over $625,000,000. The total imports of the manufactures of wool was $23,532,175 in value. The percentage of importations to our domestic manufactures is less than 4 per cent. Our exportations of woolen manufactures are scarcely nominal.

But it should be kept in mind that this $23,000,000 of imports embraces articles, in the main, that only the wealthy can buy. Take the item of cloths. All the cheaper cloths are prohibited. Those valued at not more than 40 cents a pound are subjected to a duty of 144.05 per cent; those valued at above 40 cents and under 70 cents a pound carry a duty of 123.55 per cent; while all cloths valued at above 70 cents a pound only have a duty of 96.02 per cent—the Republican habit of levying the lowest duty on goods of greatest value. The result is that but a few thousand dollars' worth of cloths under 70 cents a pound were imported. But the wealthy class, desiring certain foreign designs and finishes, imported last year cloths worth over 70 cents a pound to the amount of $6,104,000 of our total importations of $23,000,000. The costliest imported carpets account for an additional $4,392,786 of our total importations. Enormous tariff rates, ranging as high as 87 per cent, bar out all the cheaper carpets. But the wealthy class imported fine carpets, costing abroad $4.37 per square yard, to the amount in value I have just stated, they being subjected to 60 per cent tariff. We also pick up $3,220,000, the value of costly women's and children's dress goods worth above 70 cents a pound, as a part of our total importations of $23,000,000. Most all of this class of articles that would be purchased by any except people of wealth are shut out from our country by tariff rates ranging from 65 to 154 per cent. The total amount of importations of women's and children's dress goods, which is about $9,000,000, were of such high quality and value as to be beyond the reach of people of ordinary means.

COMPARISON OF RATES IN PRESENT LAW AND PROPOSED LAW.

In view of the Republican method of imposing the highest rates of taxation upon articles of largest consumption and most universal use the most accurate method of calculating the relief which the proposed bill would give the American people would be a comparison of the flat rates contained in the pending bill with the higher rates imposed by the Payne law. For illustration: The proposed bill imposes a duty of 20 per cent on all top, slubbing, and other wastes; the present law imposes a duty of 150 per cent. The proposed bill levies a rate of 25 per cent on all wool tops; the present law imposes a duty of 111 per cent. The proposed bill levies a duty of 30 per cent on all yarns; the present law imposes a tax of 159.75 per cent. The pending bill prescribes a rate of 40 per cent on all cloths; the present law levies a tax of 144 per cent. The proposed bill levies a duty of 30 per cent on all blankets; the present law imposes a tax of 136.01 per cent. The pending bill levies a tax of 45 per cent on all women's and children's dress goods; the present law imposes a tax of 154.35 per cent. The proposed bill levies a tariff of 45 per cent on all ready-made clothing and articles of wearing apparel; the present law imposes a tax of 96.40 per cent on all shawls, 95.56 per cent on all knitted articles, 85.84 per cent on wool hats, 65.16 per cent on cloaks, and 77.09 per cent on other ready-made clothing. The proposed bill levies a tariff rate of 35 per cent on all webbings, suspenders, ribbons, etc.; the present law proposes a tax of 87.06 per cent. The proposed bill levies a tax of 35 per cent on all Saxony carpets, and others in that class; the present law fixes a tax of 70.14 per cent. The proposed bill fixes a rate of 30 per cent on all Brussels carpets, and carpets of like character; the present law levies a tax of 76.29 per cent. The rates I have given, imposed by the present law, are for the year 1910, and are chiefly prohibitive.

Without proceeding further with the comparison I should say that corresponding contrasts exist on through this item of carpets. It is needless to remark that no carpets are imported save the very costly qualities, which only the wealthy can afford. It is also needless to suggest that under the enormous prohibitory rates not enough yarns are imported to run an American mill a week.

[1] Costing 80 cents a pound, the saving will be 52 cents on each pound.

Our Republican friends evidently made a strenuous effort to impose duties on woolen manufactures high enough to entirely block all importations. This is evidenced by the fact that our total importations of $23,000,000 consists almost entirely of goods wholly beyond the purchasing capacity of the middle and poorer classes of people.

Mr. Chairman, in supporting this bill we propose to so reduce the rates on all the manufactures of wool as to place them on a reasonable and fair competitive basis—in other words, on a strict tariff-for-revenue basis—and without discrimination as to class, business, or section. The real average rate on all manufactured goods under which competition would be determined is between 30 and 35 per cent, whereas the same was around 40 per cent in the Springer bill, 47.84 per cent in the Wilson bill, over 40 per cent in the Mills bill, and less than that proposed in any bill since the war. In the language of the Republican minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], on yesterday, "if treated as a bill drawn for the purpose of protection, this measure is a failure." This measure wipes out the discrimination in favor of the worsted and against the clothing manufacturer and places every woolen manufacturer upon equal terms. This is all the clothing wool manufacturer has ever asked. It is to be expected that the woolen manufacturer will be loath to give up the enormous graft upon which he has been feeding at the expense of 90,000,000 people under the existing law. Naturally they condemn the proposed bill in the strongest terms and insist that it will drive all of them out of business and destroy both the wool manufacturers and the wool producer in this country. They have already sounded this false alarm, as is their custom when about to be denied special privileges. But in contrast with this cry of fear is the frank statement contained in a tract of the American Woolen Co., circulated in 1900, when it was seeking to sell shares of its stock, which reads as follows:

> The Washington mills was started under the first administration of President Cleveland, and despite the vagaries of the tariff for the next 12 years, it prospered and succeeded in an unparalleled degree. The fact is that with the progress that has been made in woolen machinery and the increased skill of our American operatives the woolen business of America is rapidly reaching a position where even a return to the conditions similar to those existing under the Wilson bill would not seriously impair its profitableness.

Mr. Chairman, neither this Democratic House nor the country will become exercised at this effort of the beneficiaries of the existing wool schedule to retard the progress of tariff reduction. The cry of "cheap foreign labor" would be of more efficacy were it not for the fact, as I now recall, that more than 60 per cent of the labor employed in the woolen mills of this country is comprised of foreign-born persons.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman desire further time?

Mr. HULL. Just a little more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman such time as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized to conclude his remarks.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield for a question

Mr. HULL. I hope the gentleman will wait a few minutes, until I proceed further, and then I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman about the average weight of an ordinary blanket.

Mr. HULL. It ranges, as I remember, from 3 to 5 pounds. Some might go over, and lighter ones might not be quite so much.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for just a question? The gentleman now is speaking of the saving to the wholesale purchaser. When that comes to the actual consumer there must be added to what the gentleman states the intervening profit of the manufacturer and wholesaler, and the consumer really pays even more than the gentleman has stated, does he not?

Mr. HULL. Naturally. I was not undertaking to carry this through the various steps in order to reach the consumer, but I was showing the direct effect of where it operates first and where the proposed bill is substituted for the present law.

Mr. HARDY. What I wanted to state was that this effect is that it increases when it comes to the consumer.

Mr. HULL. The whole truth about the tariff, as it affects the woolgrower and the wool manufacturer, is largely summed up in the statement of Mr. S. N. D. North, made before the Dingley Ways and Means Committee in 1896. This great reduction in the tariff on wool and woolen goods—and it would be more so with free wool and corresponding reductions on the finished product—means that our manufacturer would have all the different varieties of wool in the world from which to select, without the handicap of the present high tariff, and mix with our domestic wools so as to turn out a finished product of every quality, style, texture, and price in demand here or elsewhere. He would furnish the American people a much higher class of goods for less money, his business would increase in every direction, and his large export trade would naturally arise, just as it has been built up by our American manufacturers in almost every other line. On the other hand, our wool would be in greater demand and would adjust itself under the natural law of legitimate business to a sound and stable level of prices. We produce many kinds that are not produced elsewhere. These kinds would be in demand from other countries at desirable prices. A demand for a particular kind of wool naturally enhances its price, whether sold here or in other countries.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is puerile for an American wool manufacturer to come here and insist that he must have a high tariff for protection and hem his markets within the confines of this country when other manufacturers in almost every other industry in this country are making their goods and selling them in most of the countries of the world in competition with the markets of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, one change from the existing law as imposed in the pending measure entitles it to the support of every fair-minded citizen. I allude to the change from the existing mysterious and incomprehensible system of compound rates to an ad valorem rate. This latter method leaves no possible room for graft or excessive duties which go to others than the Government, except in case of possible fraud or undervaluation, while the existing combined and compound system of rates open similar opportunities for cheating the Government and at the same time conceals an enormous amount of protection and exorbitant taxes, of which the manufacturer gets the sole benefit. It is well known that a specific rate increases the duty upon cheaper articles and decreases it as their value increases. This is shown by the following set of figures:

SPECIFIC RATES.

The inequality and injustice of specific rates of duty is well illustrated by the following prices of wool actually sold and bought in London, the specific duty, 11 cents a pound, paid when brought into the United States, and the equivalent percentages calculated. A glance will show that while each buyer pays apparently the same duty, 11 cents a pound, that some really pay twice as much as others:

	Per cent ad valorem.
Port Philip greasy, 9d (18 cents); duty, 11 cents	66⅔
Sydney greasy, 9d (18 cents); duty, 11 cents	66⅔
Cape greasy, 6½d (13 cents); duty, 11 cents	84.63
Montevideo greasy, 8d (16 cents); duty, 11 cents	70⅜
Morocco greasy, 4d (8 cents); duty, 11 cents	137
Cape greasy, 3½d (7 cents); duty, 11 cents	113

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Does not the ad valorem mode of collecting these duties afford a greater degree of fraud or greater opportunity for attempts at fraud on the customhouse?

Mr. HULL. I would like to refer again to that book that I sent up to the desk.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. In other words, where these goods, as I understand, are to be valued abroad at the selling price, is not a greater opportunity for fraud afforded? I heard what was read from the book at the desk, if the gentleman wants to read it again for that purpose. I will ask the gentleman, would he depend entirely upon the auction sales and the certificate given by the auction sales abroad in determining the value at the customhouse?

Mr. HULL. I would say to the gentleman that my examination of the tariff hearings when the Mills bill and the McKinley bill and the Wilson bill and the Dingley bill were framed shows incontrovertible testimony of the approximate fairness with which ad valorem duties can and would be collected on wool. In addition to that, in 1896, as I recall, the Ways and Means Committee had an extended hearing upon this very subject, and all the appraisers at New York were brought here to testify; and, with one exception, those gentlemen testified that under the ad valorem system more than 90 per cent of the wool was imported absolutely free from either fraud or undervaluation. They stated that the wool imported into this country is purchased at auction; that wool experts are thoroughly familiar with every class and kind and quality of wool. One gentleman gave an instance in which a manufacturing concern had a buyer employed who could shut his eyes and feel of 10 or 20 or 40 or 50 kinds of wool and instantly tell the kind and value of that wool.

I have here an extract from the statement of Mr. North right upon that point, and everyone will agree that that gentleman is as thoroughly familiar with every phase of the wool industry as any other citizen in this country. In the Dingley hearings he made this statement. He was asked:

Would you not say the remedy for these inequalities would be the ad valorem rate?

That is, the inequalities of the specific and compound rates. Mr. North answered:

There is no doubt that an ad valorem rate would remedy them, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. How would it affect the question of undervaluation if it should be imposed?
Mr. NORTH. An ad valorem rate of duty on wool?
The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.
Mr. NORTH. I do not believe there is any commodity sold in the world of any description the market of which is more accurately, publicly, and universally known than that of wool. It is like cotton, wheat, and other staple products in that respect. All the wools of the world, practically, which reach the public market are sold at auction. This country is the only large manufacturing country where the sale of wool is not in open markets.

This is his unbiased judgment as to the fairest method of levying duties on raw wool at the customhouse. Likewise, it is the judgment of Mr. Wood, who, in strong and positive language, said this before the committee:

Briefly, I would like to suggest that the only tariff on wool, in our opinion, should be an ad valorem and not a specific one. We are the largest users of domestic and foreign wools on this continent and we speak from experience.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I am fully aware of the fact that there is quite a difference of opinion between the importers on this subject, but, however that may be, is it not true that whatever the examination may be at the port of entry here, the certificate of sale and the price fixed abroad determine the value under which it is taken by the customs officers?

Mr. HULL. I know it has been more or less the custom to accept the invoices at the customhouses, but the gentleman should remember that in recent years they could quickly and easily make a chemical analysis of every quality of wool or woolen product that comes in there and determine the ingredients and proportions of wool.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; but after all, they would have to take the certificate of purchase, or else go back and get it certified from the auction block where it was sold. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me a moment further, I speak of this because a very large importer of wool informed me that this ad valorem duty afforded the greatest opportunity for fraud upon the Government, and he suggested that when it comes in per pound it is weighed and determined by the pound. If the specific duty was so much a pound, regardless of the combination that the gentleman speaks of, he believed that that would protect the Government.

Now, with reference to the bills of sale abroad, I want to say to the gentleman that I have spent some time in Europe and I have spent some time in the Orient, and it is always the custom, whoever buys anything over there, to get a bill of sale for an undervaluation to show to the customs officer, and this importer tells me that in every case there will be a certificate of sale made out by the seller abroad for a less amount than the article is really worth.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, of course, I do not controvert the statements of the gentleman in so far as he states facts which he himself knows, but it is evident that the best judgment and experience on the subject, as well as the entire weight of reason, is in favor of an ad valorem rate upon imported wool. That means that no dirt or grease or other foreign ingredient of no value would be taken into account, and no question of shrinkage, which makes a very unfair charge to the different importers, would be included. In other words, every importer of wool would pay taxes upon the exact value, whether it was in the grease or washed or scoured.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Would not an importer, if he practiced undervaluation and used false certificates, subject himself to very heavy penalties for that kind of fraud upon the Government under our import laws?

Mr. HULL. I was in the act of saying, and putting it against the information of my friend from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER], that the hearings in 1896 before the Ways and Means Committee, as I now recall them, showed, from the testimony of the appraisers in New York, whose business it was to deal directly and practically with this question, that more than 90 per cent of the wool coming in here paid taxes upon its exact value and without undervaluation or other fraud.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Even assuming that it may be true that some frauds may be perpetrated on the Government under this proposed ad valorem tax, is it not true that under the present law there is an ad valorem tax upon these woolen goods?

Mr. HULL. It is a compound rate now.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for just one more suggestion?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman that this importer suggested a way of avoiding any fraud that could be perpetrated upon the Government, by having all of the wool that comes in here based upon a specific duty on washed wool, and that the value of that wool could be easily determined without any extraordinary expense to the Government by washing a portion of the wool at the customhouse. Thereby you would get uniform treatment, and the duty would be exacted upon all wool alike and therefore the difficulties that have heretofore existed in determining the difference between the washed wool and the wool in the grease would disappear, because the duty would be paid upon the washed wool.

Mr. HULL. Then no wool could be imported unless it was washed?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. No; it would come in in the grease, but it could be tested upon the samples washed at the customhouse with but very little cost to the Government.

Mr. HULL. Much of it comes in on the sheep, and you could not test that very well.

Another fatal objection to the present specific rate is that wool of large shrinkage is virtually shut out of the American market, as is shown by the following set of figures:

Amount of wool required to make 16-ounce cloth.

	Cloth duty.	Wool, actual.	Excess.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
18 per cent shrinkage requires 1 pound 12 ounces	44	19¼	24¾
25 per cent shrinkage requires 1 pound 15 ounces	44	21 5/16	22 11/16
35 per cent shrinkage requires 2 pounds 5 ounces	44	25 1/16	18 15/16
48 per cent shrinkage requires 2 pounds 15 ounces	44	32 7/16	11 9/16
60 per cent shrinkage requires 3 pounds 11 ounces	44	40 1/16	3 15/16
70 per cent shrinkage requires 4 pounds 15 ounces	44	54 1/16	.....
75 per cent shrinkage requires 5 pounds 14 ounces	44	64⅜	.....

The effect of this is that the carded-woolen manufacturer is unable to import his wool, while the worsted manufacturer, who uses the grades of lighter shrinkage, is able to bring his in, but at a price largely in excess above what purports to be the actual duty. An ad valorem rate has been thoroughly tested and proven to be the only practical method of levying duties under this schedule. As I stated, when interrupted awhile ago, an extended hearing by the Ways and Means Committee in 1896, during which the appraisers of New York testified, showed that more than 90 per cent of the imported wool paid its just amount of taxes. This method entirely eliminates all questions of shrinkage or unfairness. It has been approved even by the chief spokesmen for the woolen manufacturers, namely, Mr. William M. Wood, president of the Woolen Trust, and also by Mr. S. N. D. North, long a lobbyist and representative before Congress of the woolen manufacturers.

Mr. Chairman, if enacted into a law, this bill, while doing no injustice to the wool producer, will save the woolen manufacturer many millions of dollars in the cost of production and will result in an annual saving to the American people of at least $150,000,000 in the reduced price of woolen goods.

We boast of our liberty, our civilization, our intelligence, our manhood, our energy, our inventive ingenuity, our unsurpassed natural resources, our up-to-date machinery, our skill in all lines of industry. One hundred and thirty-five years and two great oceans separate us from the mother country, from all great commercial countries. Then, Mr. Chairman, where is the wool producer or the woolen manufacturer who, with a revenue duty of 20 per cent on the products of the former and an average of 42.55 per cent on those of the latter, or with no duty on wool, and corresponding reductions on wool manufactures, is so abject and supine and so afflicted with greed as to come to the American Congress and beg that an enormous, unconscionable tax be retained upon all the people in order to increase his profits? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

APPENDIX A.

PRESENT COMPENSATORY DUTIES ILLUSTRATED.

The so-called compensatory duties of the woolen schedule are numerous and altogether excessive. They grow out of the compound rates and are hidden in the following rates:

Articles.	Duties.	Equivalent ad valorem.
		Per cent.
Wool and hair advanced:
Valued under 40 cents	33 cents and 50 per cent	252.20
40 to 70 cents	44 cents and 50 per cent	112.86
Above 70 cents	44 cents and 55 per cent	77.04
Tops	36⅔ cents and 30 per cent	111.73
Yarns—
30 cents and under	27½ cents and 35 per cent	159.75
More than 30 cents	38½ cents and 40 per cent	82.38
Blankets (6 rates)	22 cents and 30 per cent	95.53
	33 cents and 35 per cent	105.50
	33 cents and 40 per cent	68.19
	33 cents and 50 per cent	136.01
	44 cents and 50 per cent	122.80
	44 cents and 55 per cent	99.07

And so on through cloths, dress goods, knit goods, and all other manufactured goods in the schedule.

The specific rate of so many cents a pound is to protect the woolgrower and is the compensatory rate, while the ad valorem rate is for protection. The second column is the computed equivalent of the compound rate. In the arrangement of the schedule its manipulators have proceeded generally on the theory that it takes 4 pounds of grease wool to make 1 pound of finished cloth. The inmost stronghold of the schedule is this assumption. Some rates are based on 2 for 1 and some on 3 for 1, but the crux of the whole schedule is 4 for 1. In giving 44 cents and 50 per cent to one class of blankets, the specific rate, 44 cents, being four times the rate on 1 pound of grease wool, is given on the theory that 4 pounds of grease wool entered into every pound of that kind of blanket, and that the manufacturer paid 44 cents either as duty to the Government or enhanced price to the domestic woolgrower, and that he is entitled to this as compensation and to the added 50 per cent as protection against the competition of foreign-made goods.

It is impossible, however, to know just the exact rates between wools in the grease and in finished cloth. No two classes of wool shrink alike, nor so nearly alike as to warrant a fixed ratio or a specific rate. Woolen men of high character assert that the compensatory rates of the law are all excessive—all too high.

The following calculation showing the difference between the compensation allowed by law and the actual compensation needed appeared in the Textile World Record of January, 1909:

Eleven lots of woolens, each of 10,000 yards, were calculated as to the specific rate and the ad valorem rate, and these added and the equivalent ad valorem rate calculated. Then the actual number of pounds of grease wool used at 11 cents a pound was reduced to its equivalent ad valorem. In lot 1 the actual duties paid were 105.6 per cent of the cost and the actual duties on the grease wool used amounted to 21.1 per cent, leaving 81.5 per cent for protection. The law fixed the rates as 50.6 per cent compensatory and 55 per cent protective, making 105.6 per cent as the actual ad valorem duty. The real compensatory duty, however, was actually 24.1 per cent, thus increasing the protection of the law from 55 per cent to 81.5 per cent.

APPENDIX B.

COST OF PRODUCTION—LABOR.

Woolen and worsted goods.

[From Preliminary Report, Census Bureau, 1909.]

Number of establishments	913
Capital	$415,465,000
Cost of material used	$273,406,000
Salaries and wages	$79,214,000
Miscellaneous expenses	$21,347,000
Number of salaried officers and clerks	5,325
Average number wage earners	162,914
Total wage earners	168,239
Value of product	$419,826,000

Dividing the amount of salaries and wages by the total value of products, it is found that the labor cost of woolen and worsted goods for the year 1909 was 18.86 per cent.

The value added by manufacture to materials, $146,360,000.

Labor's share of the value added was 54.10 per cent.

Labor received 18.86 per cent of the manufactured product.

Labor received 54.10 per cent of the value added by manufacture, or $79,214,000 out of $146,360,000.

Deducting $21,347,000, miscellaneous expenses, and $79,214,000 out of the value added to material by manufacture, we have $45,799,000 gross profits of manufacture in 1909, or 11.02 per cent on the capital stock, with all its water. The water is variously estimated at from 100 to 200 per cent. The profits therefore run from 11 to 30 per cent.

The cost in England is from 14 to 24 per cent.

LOW AND HIGH PRICES, 1890 TO 1900—WORLD-WIDE.

Sauerback's compilation of prices on 45 staples for England, Prof. Conrad's compilation for 30 staples for Germany, the Bank of Japan's compilation for 40 staples in Japan, and the compilation of the Bureau of Economic Research for the United States show the following changes of prices, 1890–1900:

Countries.	1890-1896	1897-1900
Great Britain	Fell 15 per cent	Rose 17 per cent.
Germany	Fell 23 per cent	Rose 22 per cent.
Japan	Rose 31 per cent	Rose 26 per cent.
United States	Fell 23 per cent	Rose 23 per cent.

All of these countries are on a gold basis. One of them had the advantage of Republican tariff legislation, yet all had a rise beginning in 1896. The cause of the prosperity was something other than tariff tinkering one year after the rise began. This rise in prices in England began in 1895—two years before the passage of the Dingley law. The fall in prices in three of these countries began in 1890, and the passage of the Wilson bill in 1894 had nothing to do with the decline. Japan in the first period was on a silver basis, and was therefore protected from the depression in gold-standard countries. During the second period Japan was on a gold basis, and so shared the prosperity of all gold-standard countries following the increased output of gold.

The fall in prices throughout the world from 1890 to 1896 from 15 to 23 per cent was due to the limited supply of the world's gold, and the rise followed the increased production of the world's supply of that metal—enhanced by the adoption of the gold standard by India, Russia, and Austria.

Russia in 10 years ending 1897 had called for and obtained $500,000,000 of the world's supply of gold, which she withheld from circulation and hoarded in her treasury. From 1897, when she finally took the gold standard, she began to pay out gold, and in two years had returned $300,000,000 of gold to the circulation. Austria from 1890 to 1896 hoarded gold, which returned to the circulation in 1897. France, Germany, and England, to protect themselves, increased their surplus of gold from 1887 to 1896 to a point never before known. Beginning with 1897, all this gold began to return to the circulation, with a corresponding rise in prices for all commodities.

The gold supply was further increased by a remarkable increase of production. In 1897 the product doubled that of 1890; that of 1898, $50,000,000 more than 1897; that of 1899 amounted to about $315,000,000, or an increase of $200,000,000 above the average product of 1887 to 1890. The surplus supply of gold in 1895 was $125,000,000, against an average annual deficit of $26,000,000 for the four years preceding. The average surplus for the four years 1895–1898 was $124,000,000 per annum.

The rise and fall of prices for four years before and after 1896 correspond with the rise and fall of the world's deficits and surpluses for the same quadrennial periods. The fall in prices, 1891–1895, corresponded exactly with the rise in the price of gold for the same period, and the rise in prices, 1896–1899, with the fall of the price of that commodity.

Had the Wilson bill continued to 1899 the rise in commodity prices would have been exactly the same. Prices began to rise in 1896, before the passage of the Dingley law, caused by forces entirely outside the power and force of that statute. The rise and fall of prices were world wide, while the Dingley statute was confined to the United States, distributing a world-wide prosperity to a limited number of Americans in unrighteous proportions, but not strong enough to keep the world's prosperity from helping all Americans to a remarkable degree.

The increased production of gold effected a world-wide rise in prices, while the passage of the Dingley law effected the creation of innumerable trusts in the United States, which caused a rise in American trust-made goods far in advance of the slighter world-wide advances. In Europe prices rose from 1896 to 1907—12 years—according to Sauerbeck, 27 per cent. In the same period prices, according to Dun's Review, rose in the United States 49 per cent, and in 1908, 61 per cent.

The English rise in prices may be taken as the result of the increased supply of gold, and the American increase divides as follows:

Increased prices, 12 years.

	Per cent.
Increase in United States prices	49
Increase due to gold supply	27
Increase due to tariff trusts (in 1907)	22
In 1908 had risen	34

That the Wilson free-wool bill had nothing to do with the decline in the price of sheep is shown by the following table of foreign prices of sheep from 1890 to 1909:

Market value of sheep imported into the United States in the market from whence exported, as shown by Agricultural Yearbook.

Years.	Price per head.	Years.	Price per head.
1892	$3.78	1901	$3.73
1893	3.66	1902	3.58
1894	3.25	1903	3.44
1895	3.34	1904	3.42

1899	3.47	1908	4.82
1900	3.58	1909	4.90

Prices of sheep have advanced all over the world from 1897 to 1909, irrespective of tariff laws.

On the other hand, sheep for export brought excellent prices.

1899	5.96	1908	5.83
1900	5.83	1909	5.40

Beginning with 1894 export prices for American sheep almost doubled and held their rank for 11 years, when there was a slight decline.

Prices of wool (duty 22 cents a pound).

[Foreign prices are for washed wool, duty unpaid; domestic prices, New York.]

Years.	Foreign.	Domestic. Ohio XX.
	Cents.	Cents.
1894	20	23½
1895	18	18½
1896	16	19
1903	46½	32½
1904	53	34
1905	29½	35½
1906	34	34½
1907	36	34

It is clear that prices of wool were as low relatively abroad for the period 1894–1897 as they were in the United States.

It is plainly evident that no duty whatever from 1894 to 1903 was needed to protect American woolgrowers, but that notwithstanding this, the duty or a part of it was added to the price. The foreign price in 1903 and 1904 was higher than the domestic. The foreigner could not compete, duty paid, in 1905. The duty, 22 cents, added to the foreign price, 29½ cents, made 51½ cents laid down in New York, against the home price of 35½ cents. Foreign wool in 1906, 1907, and 1908 was as high as domestic, irrespective of duty. During the periods of two or three years natural law fixes foreign prices as high as or higher than our prices, during which the woolgrower needs no protection.

On first-class washed wool, not on the skin, the duty is 22 cents a pound, a rate not justifiable by foreign prices. Domestic wool at all times could have held its own without a tariff of any kind. Domestic woolgrowers produce less than two-thirds of all the wool consumed in the United States; the remainder must be purchased abroad. The above table shows beyond peradventure that the woolgrowers of the United States not only have the domestic market but can always have that market for all their goods, and can stand the proposed reduction in the present tariff laws or the total repeal of the wool duties. Wool—American wool—in the markets to-day is selling low compared with what it might sell for, inasmuch as foreign wools, duty unpaid, are running at about the same price. Many wool men agree that the woolgrowers can stand this reduction without injury.

APPENDIX E.

ANOTHER REASON FOR LOSS OF SHEEP—1893 TO 1897.

In addition to the reasons heretofore given for the loss of sheep at various periods of our history there is the further reason of sales and killings for mutton at periods when the price of mutton was abnormally high. One of these high-priced mutton periods came in 1894, 1895, and 1896, and brought about a loss of nearly 2,000,000 sheep just at the time that Republicans were charging a loss of sheep to the Wilson bill. The following is taken from the yearbook of 1896, and is another answer to misleading statements of Republicans:

British imports of sheep.

1894	484,597
1895	1,065,470
1896 (9 months)	614,855

American sheep during the last three years of this period were landed in Liverpool in greater numbers than in any preceding year. The profitable market for mutton appears to have encouraged sheep growing and fattening in many of the Western States.

American yearlings and 2-year-olds commanded practically the same price as English sheep, and were sold during the year 1896 at from 14 to 16 cents a pound.

This trade might have gone on indefinitely but for the fact that the scab appeared among one lot of sheep from America in the latter part of the year, which broke up the British importation of sheep from the United States at about the same time that Republicans were passing the Dingley law. The exportation to Great Britain ceased because of British antagonism to diseased American sheep, and these sheep were retained in American folds to swell the number of sheep and indirectly aid the new tariff to make a greater showing for the American sheep industry.

But apart from this, why should 80,000,000 of people tax themselves 11 and 12 cents a pound for the sheep raisers, who produced 300,000,000 pounds of wool? Why should all industries be taxed enormously and outrageously in order to foster sheep raisers? Why should the people pay sheepmen a bounty on sheep and wool?

APPENDIX H.

MANUFACTURES NOT LANGUISHING.

The following figures, showing the growth of our export trade in manufactures, speak with irresistible eloquence not only as to our growth, but as to the fact that high tariffs are no longer needed to protect our manufacturing industries:

Exports of manufactures—per cent of all exports.

	Per cent.
1880	14.78
1890	21.18
1900	36.37
1910	44.85

First nine months of calendar year 1910, 51.34 per cent.

When more than half our exports are manufactures they certainly need no protection.

Export values.

1860	$48,000,000
1870	70,000,000
1880	122,000,000
1890	179,000,000
1900	485,000,000
1910	767,000,000

The Wilson law certainly did not bankrupt our manufacturers. When they shut down in 1894 to starve labor and to knife the Democratic Party and the country they were full-handed and ready to take advantage of the Dingley law—a law especially devised and passed for their benefit.

No hearings are needed to show that the present tariff rates can be cut downward, and cut deep.

Production.

1890	$9,372,000,000
1900	13,004,000,000
1905	16,867,000,000
1910 (estimated)	20,000,000,000

From 1890 our manufactures increased more than 100 per cent owing to the unnecessary protection—the unjust and unwarranted protection—of the Dingley law. During the same period the increase in the value of manufactures exported was 325 per cent.

Comparison of manufactured exports to exports of food products.

Years.	Manufactured exports.	Exports of foods.	Percentage of food products.
1880	$122,000,000	$459,000,000	55.77

1900	485,000,000	545,000,000	39.80
1910	767,000,000	369,000,000	21.59

Protection has built up the manufacturing industry at the expense of the agricultural industry and of all other industries.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour and thirty minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the bill we have before us for a revision of the woolen schedule, known as Schedule K, shows the firm determination of the Democratic Party to be true to its pledges for a downward revision of the tariff. As a member of the Ways and Means Committee which reports the bill, I can testify to the efforts of the majority of that committee to bring out a bill which would meet the difficulties of this perplexing schedule. Your committee believes it has accomplished this, and it now presents H. R. 11019, which has the support of all the Democratic members of the committee, as a revision of Schedule K in the interest of the consumers.

The rate of duty on manufactured products under the Dingley bill is 89.42 per cent and under the Payne bill 90.12 per cent, and on the expected importations under this bill the estimated rate of duty will be 42.55 per cent. Can better evidence than this be given of the insincerity of the Republican pledges to revise the tariff downward and of the faithfulness with which the Democrats redeem their preelection promises?

DUTY TO PROVIDE FOR REVENUE.

In presenting a revision of this schedule your committee are obliged to keep in mind the fact that the revenues of the Government must be provided for. The total income of the Government from the imports of wool and woolens for 1910 was $41,900,693, or 12.8 per cent of total duties collected. The proposed measure is estimated to produce $40,556,200 in revenue, the importations being expected to increase sufficiently under the lower duties to furnish a sum nearly equal to the present revenue. True to its promises, the Democratic Party will without question effect great economies in the Government and will greatly lighten the burden on our people through taxation.

The reforms, however, can not be immediately effected, and as this schedule takes effect by itself, it is necessary to provide from it a revenue substantially equal to that which is now being secured from the imports which come under it. A tariff tax is not a benefit to be distributed between people, but a burden to be placed where it will rest lightest, and with this in view your committee have sought to lighten the taxes on the consumers of the cheaper goods and place the heavier burden on the more expensive products where best it can be borne.

FREE RAW MATERIALS.

To lighten the tariff burden as much as possible taxes should be placed on the finished product, and the raw materials entering into industry as basis of manufactures should be free. A reform of the present taxation tariff system must commence as far as possible on free raw materials and a reduction of the duties to a competitive basis on the finished product.

DEMOCRATIC RULES.

Secretary of the Treasury Walker, in his report on the tariff in 1846, laid down rules which, I believe, should always guide the Democrats in the preparation of the tariff laws. His report says:

1. That no more revenue should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government economically expended.
2. That no duty be imposed upon any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest revenue.
3. That below such rate discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties; or, for imperative reasons, the article may be placed in the list of those free from all duty.
4. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed upon luxuries.
5. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S MESSAGE.

The words on Schedule K are no less true to-day than when, in 1887, President Cleveland, in his famous tariff message to Congress, declared his position on the wool schedule, as follows:

When the number of farmers engaged in wool raising is compared with all the farmers in the country, and the small proportion they bear to the population is considered; when it is made apparent that in the case of a large part of those who own sheep the benefit of the present tariff on wool is illusory; and, above all, when it must be conceded that the increase of the cost of living caused by such tariffs becomes a burden upon those with moderate means, and the poor, the employed, the unemployed, the sick and well, and the young and old; and that it constitutes a tax which, with relentless grasp, is fastened on the clothing of every man, woman, and child in the land, reasons are suggested why the removal or reduction of this duty (on wool) should be included in a revision of our tariff law.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman from Massachusetts, I suppose, regards Mr. Walker as perhaps the greatest Democratic authority in the making of a tariff, does he not?

Mr. PETERS. I should say he was certainly among the greatest tariff writers we have had.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Does not the gentleman think that Mr. Walker was honestly and intelligently applying his own doctrine when he levied a duty of 30 per cent on raw wool?

Mr. PETERS. I have no doubt that Mr. Walker always endeavored to carry out the principles he advocated, but in the levying of that duty at that time, as in the levying of the duty at the present time, the particular circumstances and condition of the times must be borne in mind. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Does the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts go so far as to say that it had no effect on the price of wool and the production of wool in this country?

Mr. PETERS. It is impossible to tell whether the Wilson Act did or did not have an effect on the prices during the period in which it was in operation.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman will agree that there was less production of wool, and that the price went down, and that in 1897 there was 350,000,000 pounds of wool brought into this country, double what had been brought in before under the previous acts and more in that year than has ever been brought in since under the changed act, will he not?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly. In 1897 it was known that a duty was soon to be placed on wool, and in order to take advantage of getting wool imported free large importations were made from abroad, and the people stored up the wool in this country. While during the Wilson Act the price of wool decreased and the number of sheep in this country decreased, yet there was a corresponding decrease in the price of wool in the sales at both London and Antwerp, and the number of sheep in Australia decreased almost exactly proportionate to the decrease in this country.

If the Wilson Act caused that, free wool ought to have increased the number of sheep in Australia instead of decreasing it. But it followed about the same course as in this country. That indicated that it was a world-wide panic and hard times which brought the conditions in this country which existed under the Wilson Act, and that the Wilson Act itself was not the cause of that depression.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman answer one more question? Why is it that since the Wilson Act went out and the Dingley Act came in there has been a constantly growing increase in the price of wool as well as in the production of wool?

Mr. PETERS. If it was the reason the gentleman seems to infer, it ought not to apply to Australia and to the London market, whereas the increase in Australia has been greater during that time than has been the increase in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman will find there is a decrease in Australia in the last few years in the pounds of wool production.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit me to interrupt for a moment?

Mr. PETERS. In just one minute. In the year 1893 there were 47,273,553 sheep in the United States, the largest number of sheep from 1886 to 1893, according to the figures of the Statistical Abstract. In 1897 there were 36,818,643, which is the smallest during that entire period of depression, a decrease of 10,454,910 sheep. In 1903, and I ask the attention of the gentleman to this, there were in this country 63,964,876 sheep, and in 1905 there were only 45,170,423 sheep, a decrease of 18,894,453 sheep, or a decrease during the time of a 11-cent duty on wool of nearly twice the number of sheep that there were during the Wilson bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The table I later submit shows an increase, not a decrease, in the Australian sheep in the last seven years. In 1902 the number of sheep in Australia was 53,668,000; in 1909, 91,676,000; a far greater comparative increase than took place in the United States in the same period.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I want to ask the gentleman to continue to read on, because I stated it had been on the increase. I know there is one year there when there is a decrease.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit——

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado, speaking about the influence of the tariff upon prices, how he would solve this situation. In 1909, in my district in Missouri, the wool clip was worth 29 cents a pound, and in 1910 it was worth 20 cents a pound. This year it is worth from 15 to 16 cents a pound. What influence has the tariff got on the price?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would answer the gentleman from Missouri, if I may be allowed to, by saying that I believe it is a constant increase of importing wool into this country. That is my judgment about that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman insist the present rates are not high enough?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. On wool?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. No; I do not think wool is high enough. I never will think that as long as I am in the sheep-growing business. [Laughter.] Another thing I will say to the gentleman from Missouri is that the Woolen Trust has a very great deal to do with that also.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think that is correct.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. But I do believe that every pound of wool that is brought in here from abroad tends to decrease the price of wool here, because every pound of wool that is brought into this country will displace a pound of wool in this country.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Can that be true when we do not raise more than half of what we use?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; as long as we are not consuming any more than we are consuming, and if we consume more, we will increase more; but as long as we get purer wool we will have clothing that will last longer, and there will be a less consumption.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he will yield to me for a minute?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado if he meant to say that the trust controlled in any way or affected the price of raw wool?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I do not mean that. I mean that the trusts controlling the product, the finished product, as it has its natural effect upon the wool as well.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Controls the price of wool in this country, does it not?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The trust?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I really do not know. I do not know; but I would like to have that answered.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado to explain why it is that western wool in 1900, after three years of the effect of the Dingley tariff of 11 cents a pound on raw wool, why the price was but 10 cents, 1 cent less than the tariff, if it was not controlled by a trust?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I do not know what market the gentleman speaks about.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I speak about the market of San Antonio, San Angelo, and southwest Texas.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Your rate is about 2½ cents a pound from that place in Texas, as it is from my place in the West, in Denver.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Then 2½ cents a pound from 11 would leave only 8½ cents a pound, and the price there was only 10 cents a pound, 1 cent less than the tariff.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Well, I want to say to the gentleman that he illustrates just what I have been trying to show—that unless you have a central market you can only get the price minus the freight that is placed upon it to bring it to the central market.

Now, I have been selling wool at 11 cents and never did get the price they got either in Liverpool or in Boston, because you have got to determine what is the freight upon it. You can send wool from New York to London, and vice versa, for one-half of a cent a pound, and we pay 2½ cents a pound from Denver to Boston.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman from Colorado seems to have mistaken the purposes of this revision. This bill is a revision of the schedule under our promises to lift the burden from the backs of the consumers of woolen goods [applause on the Democratic side], and in carrying out that purpose the Democratic Party means to redeem its pledges, and the duties on one product as well as another will be looked on from that point of view and from the point of view of revenue, and not from the point of view of giving special privileges to any class of people in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman just yield for one more question?

Mr. PETERS. With pleasure.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman realizes that in fixing the duty upon products of wool you are putting the manufacturers of Massachusetts and New England upon a competitive basis with the foreigner, are you not?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Well, now——

Mr. PETERS. That certainly was our intention in drafting this bill.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Was it your intention to put the woolgrower upon a competitive basis with the foreign woolgrower?

Mr. PETERS. Our intention in drafting this bill is to collect sufficient revenue to run the Government and distribute the burdens where they may fall the lightest and not to distribute the duties as a benefit to be handed to one person or to be given to one manufacturer or one part of the country.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Therefore the question never entered into the minds of those who framed this bill to make the woolgrower upon a competitive basis with the foreign woolgrower.

Mr. PETERS. The woolgrower is on a competitive basis with the foreign woolgrower.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. In this bill—does the gentleman think that is so in this bill?

Mr. PETERS. The fact of their competing in the same market puts them on a competitive basis——

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. But can he compete with the foreign grower of wool under this bill? Does the gentleman think that he can do it?

Mr. PETERS. I am absolutely certain he can.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I want to say to the gentleman that I am just as absolutely certain that he can not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question——

Mr. PETERS. With pleasure.

Mr. LONGWORTH (continuing). In line with the question asked by the gentleman from Colorado? Has a majority of the Ways and Means Committee made any estimate as to how much the price of raw wool will be decreased by this bill?

Mr. PETERS. I do not think any such estimate has been made, as the price of raw wool depends on so many factors and fluctuates through so many causes that it would be impossible to come to any fairly accurate estimate as to what it would be in another year or under other conditions.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It has been the intention of your committee, has it not, to depreciate the price of raw wool?

Mr. PETERS. It has not been the intention of the committee to depreciate; rather, it has been the intention of the committee to enable the manufacturer to obtain the imported wool cheaper, so that the tax on the finished product may be made less.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, but the gentleman I do not think answered my question. Of course, if this bill is as the gentleman says, solely in the interest of the consumer, it must be the intention of the committee to depreciate the price of raw wool and of manufactured wool. Now, my question relates solely to the price of raw wool, and I ask the gentleman if it is not the intention of the committee to depreciate the price of raw wool.

Mr. PETERS. It is expected the price of raw wool will be lower, if this bill passes, than if the present duty of 11 cents a pound should remain on it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. You mean that the committee has no idea at all as to how much that price will be depreciated?

Mr. PETERS. That is absolutely impossible to determine.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then I will ask the gentleman——

Mr. PETERS. If the gentleman will just allow me, it is expected that the increased use of wool will stimulate the demand by the mills so that there will be more wool used in this country than at the present time, and it is expected that that will, at least in a measure, compensate for the change in the rates of duty.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think that the gentleman has yet answered my question. I will put it in this form: How much is it hoped that this bill will depreciate the price of raw wool?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield to me to answer that question?

Mr. PETERS. I first promised to yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. I just wanted the gentleman from Ohio to answer the question I asked the gentleman from Colorado, namely, if under the existing law he can account for the fluctuation in the value of wool, perhaps he can answer how much the price of wool will be depreciated by the bill under consideration. In 1899, in my district, wool was worth 29 cents, in 1900 it was worth 20 cents, and this year it is worth 15 to 16 cents. Now, if the gentleman can solve that fluctuation in price under the Payne law, perhaps he can tell what the depreciation will be under the pending bill. It does not seem that the law itself controls the price.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman that I am not assuming to say how much the price of raw wool will be depreciated by this bill. I am asking a member of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee to state how much it is hoped or expected the price of raw wool will be depreciated.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I would like to say to the gentleman from Ohio that it is impossible for the committee to know exactly what the changes in the price of wool may be; but, as one of the committee, I know that the calculation of at least a large majority of the members of the committee is that the price of wool will be enhanced by this bill. This bill is in favor of the woolen industry by being in favor of the people, and there will be a largely increased demand for wool. To illustrate how much will be the difference, we will say, when taking the testimony of the manufacturers in the East and, say, our western woolgrowers, it shows that they get about 2 cents a pound now of the 11 cents that the Republicans have levied on raw wool? If the doctrine of division would come in, and no difference in the consumption, why it would be then a difference of about two-thirds of a cent a pound. In other words, the producer would get about two-thirds of a cent a pound. He is now getting 2 cents a pound. But our contention is that the woolen industry will be so stimulated and put upon such a rational basis that the American people can get their goods at a reasonable price, and therefore the price of wool will be enhanced and the price of woolen goods will come down.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think I understand the gentleman. He differs, then, substantially from his colleague?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not think——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Pardon me; the gentleman's colleague has just stated in reply to my question that it was expected that the price of raw wool would be depreciated, but the gentleman himself thinks it would be enhanced.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not wish to take the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I did not understand him to say that, except in this way, that so far as the tax was concerned there would be a less number of things to bring up the price. In other words, the revenue tariff would not raise the price of wool as much as the 11 cents that is now on it. That would be true if it had affected it at all. But our contention is, it is now controlled by a trust, and the growers get almost nothing from it and, under this bill, if it has the effect the Democrats think it will, the trust will not have the control of the market as now, and wool will be back on its normal base and the woolgrower will get the benefit and the consumers of this country will get the benefit.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to understand clearly what is the opinion of the Ways and Means Committee. The gentleman from Massachusetts says this bill will depreciate the price of raw wool, and the gentleman from Texas says it will increase it. Now, what I would like to know is, what is, we will say, the average opinion of the majority of the members of the Ways and Means Committee as to the effect that this bill will have on raw wool? It is probably asking too much, but it seems to me that this House——

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I simply want to state that we, the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, not having had an opportunity to acquire the views of the majority until now, when the bill is being explained by the members of the majority——

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Take them up one by one——

Mr. LONGWORTH. We ask these questions in good faith and for information, and I will now ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what, in his opinion, is the opinion of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee as to the effect that this bill will have on the price of raw wool, either by way of enhancing it or depreciating it?

Mr. PETERS. I wish to answer the gentleman's question fairly. It depends upon factors which it is impossible for any set of men thoroughly to estimate. The gentleman will see that in 1903 the wool from his own State was quoted in the market at 28 cents a pound. In 1909 it was 36 cents. In the meantime it had been subject to very many fluctuations, depending on the chances of the crop, the demand for woolen goods, the state of the woolgrowing industry in Argentina and Australia and New Zealand and general commercial conditions, and it would be impossible to state with any sincerity that we can foretell the price of raw wool under this bill.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL], in endeavoring to elucidate the question for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], referred to a trust. I do not know whether he referred to the same trust that was referred to yesterday by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], but I assume that the Ways and Means Committee must have given very careful consideration to the question whether there is such a thing as a Worsted Trust, and I wanted to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if it is a fact that there is a great corporate combination known as the Worsted Trust which controls the price of goods to the consumer and arbitrarily fixes prices?

Mr. PETERS. There is a resolution which has been introduced in the House, and is now pending before one of the committees for consideration, looking toward an inquiry into that matter, and the gentleman will be given every opportunity to present evidence before that committee.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No; what I wanted to inquire is whether such a trust exists; that is, whether the committee of which the gentleman is a distinguished member has had its attention called to the existence of such a trust. Is it true that such a trust exists?

Mr. PETERS. There is claimed to be a combination of the producers of textile goods; there is some evidence of a combination among the producers of textile goods, but——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is there a trust known as the Worsted Trust—commonly known as the Worsted Trust?

Mr. PETERS. I never heard of one called that.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is there a corporation known as the American Woolen Co.?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is that company referred to as the Woolen Trust?

Mr. PETERS. I understand it operates both woolen and worsted mills.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] referred to it yesterday as a trust?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is that trust protected under this bill?

Mr. PETERS. The product of that company is affected under the present law, as are all the producers of textiles.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Under this bill also is it protected?

Mr. PETERS. Every producer of textiles would come under this bill.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Exactly. Then this bill does protect this great combination known as the Woolen Trust?

Mr. PETERS. Not at all. It is not sought to give protection to any particular concern. It is intended to place the finished products on a revenue basis. Whether or not there is in existence a combination called a trust at this date is something which other departments of the Government can take up, but there has been no evidence submitted to the committee to warrant it in coming to that conclusion.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Just a moment. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] stated that this bill protects an iniquitous trust to the extent of 45 per cent, did he not, or did not the gentleman from Massachusetts hear him? Did he state the truth about that, as you understand it?

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman from Michigan wants to know what the gentleman from Kansas had in his mind. As they are both members of the same party and take a similar view of these public questions, I suggest that the gentleman from Michigan go to the gentleman from Kansas to ascertain that. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Very well. Has your party declared that the best way to destroy the trusts is to remove protection from articles made by trusts?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But you do not seem to be executing that policy in this bill.

Mr. PETERS. Certainly we are carrying out that policy. The gentleman assumes the existence of a Woolen Trust.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not assume the existence of anything. I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts, and he stated that there exists a Woolen Trust, and that his party is protecting it 45 per cent.

Mr. PETERS. I did not say so. The gentleman says that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] said so.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And the gentleman from Massachusetts said that the gentleman from Kansas had correctly stated it.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he does not think that 42 per cent, or whatever there is in this bill, is much less protection than what is contained in the bill the gentleman from Michigan voted for when the Payne-Aldrich bill passed?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And as the same economic conditions existed in the woolen trade at the time the Payne-Aldrich bill passed that exist now, it is strange that the gentleman should have voted for a rule at that time to prevent his offering any amendment to meet this situation which, in his mind, exists.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. The gentleman from Michigan did not offer any objection at that time, did he?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for another inquiry?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman's party, in the framing of this bill, is proposing to levy a tariff on the tariff-for-revenue-only basis, as I understand. Has the gentleman considered whether under his theory, not mine, he could reduce the duty still lower on raw wool, thereby more nearly approximating the view of his great party leader, Mr. Bryan, and at the same time increase importations and increase revenue? Has he considered whether that could be done?

Mr. PETERS. Yes; and I may say to the gentleman that we would have had free wool, and the duties on woolen goods would have been made lower, had it not been for the necessity of raising sufficient revenue to pay for the extravagances which have been imposed on the Government by the gentleman's own party, in which, as he is in a very prominent position in that party, he may consider himself entitled to a great deal of responsibility. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. However, the Treasury statement seems to indicate that we are increasing our revenue and that there is no real reason, even from your standpoint, on which to base this measure.

Mr. PETERS. Does not the gentleman know that there is a bond sale pending?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. On the gentleman's theory, could he not still further increase his revenue by reducing the duty on raw wool?

Mr. PETERS. No.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And also more closely approximate the views of his great leader, Mr. Bryan?

Mr. PETERS. I wish to say that putting the bill on the basis of raw wool——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Could he not reduce the duty still further, even on his own theory, and still raise more revenue?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly not. If that could have been done, we would have done it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is, even to the point of free raw wool?

Mr. PETERS. Most certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That would be the gentleman's idea?

Mr. PETERS. That would be my idea, that I would have as little a burden as possible placed on the consumer.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Of course that would be somewhat deleterious to the sheep-growing industry, but that would make no difference from the gentleman's standpoint.

Mr. PETERS. I will go into the question of wool and sheep at a later point in my remarks.

In regard to the question as to whether or not there is a trust in the woolen or worsted trade, there was a total production of $419,826,000 in the United States in 1909, and in the last annual report which I looked up of the American Woolen Co. their sales amounted to about $45,000,000, or something over 10 per cent of the total.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether or not he will vote for this bill?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I have not thought it likely that I would.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does not the gentleman from Michigan agree with his own great leader, President Taft, when he said that Schedule K was absolutely indefensible?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think Schedule K ought to be revised, but not in the way that the Democrats are revising it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What kind of a bill would the gentleman vote for?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I am not going to frame up a bill now, and I do not think this bill suits you gentlemen.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman from Michigan says he is not going to frame up a bill. I trust that he will not try to make a speech on one in my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for me to ask the gentleman from Texas a question?

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I feel that the gentleman from Colorado has already taken up a good deal of my time, and I must go on.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman from Texas asked me a question.

Mr. PETERS. I shall have to ask the gentleman from Colorado to excuse me now.

DEMOCRATIC PROBLEM.

The Democrats in their last national platform said that "graduated reductions should be made in such other schedules as should be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis." In framing a revision the committee are faced by the necessity of providing substantially an amount of revenue equal to that now derived from Schedule K. A revision of the tariff as a whole might allow the decrease in revenue from one schedule to be made up in another, but where the tariff is reduced one schedule at a time substantially the same revenue must be provided. Your committee believes this revision to be an important step forward, as it places on the consumer less duties than have ever been placed on him before, but we recognize that there is still left an opportunity to reach a point in the future where a schedule can be drawn on the basis of free wool, accompanied by a further reduction in the finished product. The following table shows the duties collected under the present Payne Act and those estimated under the act herewith submitted:

Items.	Present act.—Results for year ending June 30, 1910.	Proposed act.—Estimated results for a 12-month period.
Raw wool:
Imports	$47,687,293.20	$66,991,000.00
Duties	$21,128,728.74	$13,398,200.00
Average unit of value per pound	$0.186
Equivalent ad valorem rate per cent	44.31	20.00
Manufactures of wool:
Imports	$23,057,357.78	$63,831,000.00
Duties	$20,775,820.76	$27,158,000.00
Equivalent ad valorem rate per cent	90.10	42.55
Total revenue	$41,904,549.50	$40,556,200.00

The woolen schedule, the backbone of the tariff, has had the public attention centered on it in most of the tariff revisions, and in taking it up now it is of interest to briefly review the history of that schedule in the previous tariffs.

BRIEF HISTORY OF SCHEDULE K.

The tariff on woolen goods appeared in one of the first tariff bills of the country in 1798, and in all succeeding bills the woolen schedule carried substantial duties. The present schedule on articles manufactured from wool came into existence in 1867, and as it exists to-day it does not differ greatly from the law imposed at that time. Not only has this schedule been in existence for a long term of years, but it was made originally under abnormal conditions. The public debt during the war between the States had accumulated to dangerous proportions, and the tariff act of 1867 was drawn for the purpose of providing revenues to meet the enormous expenses which the country was facing. At the time of this act there were also heavy internal-revenue taxes which the manufacturer had to endure. To meet these revenue taxes high compensatory duties were created and were added to the protective duties to enable the American manufacturer to compete with the importer. The internal-revenue taxes existing at that time have long been removed, but Schedule K still carries with it the compensatory duties. The only change has been to raise the ad valorem rate, designed originally to give protection in the acts of 1883, 1890, 1897, and 1909 from 25 to 60 per cent. The passing of the Wilson bill by the Democrats in 1894 marked the only time when the high compound duties of Schedule K were not in effect. This bill removed the duty on wool and simplified the duties on manufactures of wool by abolishing the specific rates.

THE WILSON ACT.

It is difficult to determine the effect of the Wilson Act. In speaking of the tariff act of 1894, Prof. F. W. Taussig, in his Tariff History of the United States, says (p. 319):

> It (the Wilson Act) went into effect shortly after an acute commercial crisis, and in the worst stage of a period of depression. The crisis and the depression were due, in this case as in others, to a long and complex set of causes, some of them still obscure even to the best informed and most skilled observers. That the tariff act played any serious part in bringing them about would not be maintained by any cool and competent critic.

The Wilson Act went into effect during times of great depression. The next presidential election was contested, not on the tariff grounds, but on other issues. At the time of the election of 1896 there had been no opportunity to fairly judge the effects of the Wilson law commercially and politically. The people of the country decided that campaign on issues entirely apart from those involved in the tariff discussion. The failure or success of the Wilson bill in the public mind was not the paramount issue of the campaign and received but little attention. The general depression had decreased both importations and internal revenue, and when the Republicans in 1897 took up the tariff, they took advantage of the lack of public attention on the subject and of the opportunity which the need of greater revenue presented to draw a high-protective bill.

THE DINGLEY ACT.

The Dingley bill, which in 1897 repealed the Wilson Act, was the highest protective measure the country had yet seen, and as enacted the bill was practically a raise of about 10 per cent on the McKinley Act of 1890.

The Spanish War, following immediately after its passage, diverted public attention and presented new issues to the people, and a wave of great prosperity and industrial activity overswept the country. At this same time there also appeared a general increase in the prices of commodities. The high-protective tariff, in many instances prohibitive, had enabled the American manufacturers to combine and form monopolies and extort unusual prices from the American consumers. The issues of the Spanish War and commercial problems largely distracted public attention with the result that the tariff entered little into the discussions of the presidential campaign of 1904.

THE PAYNE ACT.

The demand, however, for a lower tariff, which those in control of the Republican Party successfully struggled against, became more and more insistent until, in the platform of 1908, this demand was recognized, and a promise by the Republicans to revise the tariff was inserted. That this promise would not be carried out was freely predicted by the Democrats, and to-day the words of the Democratic platform seem to have been singularly prophetic of what occurred:

We welcome the belated promises of tariff reform now affected by the Republican Party in tardy recognition of the righteousness of the Democratic position on this question, but the people can not safely trust the execution of this work to a party which is so deeply obligated to the highly protected interests as is the Republican Party. We call attention to the significant fact that the promised relief was postponed until after the coming election—an election to succeed in which the Republican Party must have that same support from the beneficiaries of the high protective tariff as it has always heretofore received from them; and to the further fact that during the years of the uninterrupted power no action whatsoever has been taken by the Republican Congress to correct the admittedly existing tariff iniquities.

We favor immediate revision of the tariff by the reduction of import duties. Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list, and material reductions should be made in the tariff upon the necessities of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home, and graduated reductions should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis.

REPUBLICAN REVISION UPWARD.

On the issue stated in their own platform to be "unequivocally" for tariff revision, which revision was explained by all the Republican speakers, including the candidate for President, to mean a revision downward, the Republicans were elected. A revision was undertaken, but in open defiance of the most solemn and specific pledges made to the people of this country the Republicans revised the tariff not downward, but upward, and as a result of their work the total tariff duties which, in the previous year had been imposed at a net ad valorem rate of 44.16 per cent, were estimated by the framers of the Payne-Aldrich bill at 45.72 per cent. Schedule K, among the most important schedules of the tariff, as it affected cloth and clothing entering into the cost of living of every person in the country, was, except in some small and unimportant details, left untouched, and as a result of this solemn pledge of downward revision the duties which, under the Dingley Act, had been 58.19 per cent ad valorem in 1908 under this act were made 59.23 per cent ad valorem in 1910.

CRITICISM OF THE SCHEDULE.

The President does not attempt to support this schedule in the bill, and himself said at Beverly, Mass., "The woolen schedule is indefensible, and I propose to say so," and in explanation of why this schedule was not revised in accordance with the promises made in the Republican platform, he said, at Winona, Minn., "It (the failure to revise Schedule K) is the most important defect in the Payne tariff bill and in the performance of the promise of the platform to reduce rates to a difference in the cost of production with reasonable profit to the manufacturer." In this same address he also said:

With respect to the woolen schedule, I agree that it is too high, and that it ought to have been reduced, and that it probably represents considerably more than the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here. The difficulty about the woolen schedule is that there were two contending factions early in the history of the Republican tariff, to wit, woolgrowers and wool manufacturers; and that finally, many years ago, they settled on a basis by which wool in the grease should have 11 cents a pound, and by which allowance should be made in the shrinkage in the differential upon wool manufactures. The percentage of duties was very heavy—quite beyond the difference in the cost of production, which was not then regarded as a necessary or proper limitation on protective duties.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION, 1910.

Faced with an ever-increasing cost of living and betrayed by the promise to reduce the burdens of the tariff, the people turned to the Democrats and at last appreciated the soundness of the words of our platform of two years before. The rebuke which was administered to the Republican Party is too well known for me to dwell on. A Republican majority of 45 was turned in one election to a Democratic majority of 63. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

IMPORTANCE OF SCHEDULE K.

A revision of the tariff schedule by schedule forbids a sweeping reduction in Schedule K until some of the now prohibitive duties in other schedules have been lowered to a revenue basis. The importance of the revenues from Schedule K are shown by the following table, which indicates the percentage of the total revenues derived from the various schedules of the tariff:

Per cent of revenue derived for year ending June 30, 1910.

1.	Schedule E.—Sugar, molasses, and manufactures of	16.26
2.	Schedule J.—Flax, hemp, jute, and manufactures of	15.23
3.	Schedule K.—Wool and manufactures of	12.83

13.	Schedule M.—Pulp, papers, and books	1.62
14.	Schedule D.—Wood and manufactures of	.98

SCHEDULE K PROHIBITIVE.

Despite the fact that Schedule K furnished a very considerable part of the revenue derived from duties on imports into this country it is practically prohibitive. In the first place, Schedule K, which in 1892 provided 24.1 per cent of the revenue, now furnishes but 12.8 per cent; secondly, we imported in 1909 but $18,102,416 of woolen manufactures, or but slightly over 3 per cent of the production at home, which amounted for the same year to $514,732,000 worth.

The following table will show how restricted we are to our home market compared with the United Kingdom:

Foreign commerce in wool manufactures (yarns excluded), 1909—United States and United Kingdom compared.

Countries.	Value of imports.	Value of exports.
United States	$17,707,000	$1,971,000
United Kingdom	35,459,000	100,474,000

It will be noted, first of all, that our exports of wool manufactures are merely nominal. Secondly, that the United Kingdom, which exports heavily, imports twice as much of woolen goods as we do, despite the fact that the variety of wool at the disposal of the manufacturers of the United Kingdom far exceeds that available in the United States.

DEMOCRATIC PROMISES.

The Democratic Party was elected on a promise to revise downward in the interest of the consumer. A study of this bill will indicate that this promise has been faithfully carried out by your committee, and I submit herewith a comparison showing the reductions in each paragraph made by the present bill from those of its two immediate predecessors:

CHANGES IN BILL.

The inequalities and defects in the present Schedule K are not the least of the objections to the act as passed. Taxes should be levied justly and equitably, and no bill should seek either to hide from the people the rate of taxation which it levied or to give in disguise, under the power of taxation, an advantage to one person or one producer over another. Specific duties have been employed continuously in the high tariffs for both of these purposes, and in no bill is it more difficult to determine the exact amount of tax imposed on the consumer or the protection given to the manufacturer than under the present law in the mixed and ad valorem duties in Schedule K. To meet these difficulties and to present an absolutely fair method of levying the duties, your committee has adopted ad valorem in place of specific rates.

AD VALOREM RATES.

A specific duty of so much per pound and so much per yard always bears hardest on the less expensive articles, and so the poor are taxed on a higher ad valorem rate than those who are more well to do or those who are better able to bear it. The textile schedules, more than any others, present characteristics of this nature. This was well recognized in the past and commented on by Mr. Mills in reporting the Mills bill to the House in the Fiftieth Congress, first session. The report of the Ways and Means Committee accompanying that bill, H. R. 901, says:

In the woolen schedule we have substituted ad valorem for specific duties. The specific duty is the favorite of those who are to be benefited by high rates, who are protected against competition, and protected in combinations against consumers of their products. There is a persistent pressure by manufacturers for the specific duty, because it conceals from the people the amount of taxes they are compelled to pay to the manufacturer. The specific duty always discriminates in favor of the costly article and against the cheaper one, and therefore it imposes a heavier burden as it goes down from the highest-priced articles to the lowest. This discrimination is peculiarly oppressive in woolen and cotton goods, which are necessaries of life to all classes of the people.

DISADVANTAGES OF THE INEQUALITIES OF THE PRESENT SYSTEM.

Objection to this form of duty adopted in the proposed bill is based on the temptation to undervaluation which it is supposed to produce. It is hard to see why ad valorem duties should be more difficult to apply in this schedule than they are in other schedules of the tariff act in which they abound. As to the duty on raw wool, much of it is sold abroad at public auction, the value of which may be ascertained or standard of values established by the sales, which should make the ascertaining of its values perfectly practicable. The present schedule offers the greatest inducement to undervaluation, because while it not only has the ad valorem duties in addition to specific duties, it also divides the schedules into classes based on their valuation, which classes vary greatly as regards their import duties. Wool of class 3, valued at 12 cents or less a pound, comes in at a rate of 3 cents per pound, while above 12 cents such wools pay 7 cents per pound. In many of the paragraphs on cloths there is a division into classes, based on differences in value, and varying rates of duties are levied on the different classes. By thus dividing the commodity into different classes the greatest incentive to undervaluation is offered; for an importer by a slight variation in the value may change the class under which the importation comes, and thus save a large amount: the prospect of great gains from comparatively little change in valuation is the strongest incentive to fraud. Such excessive incentive to undervaluation would be removed by this bill.

CHANGES IN THE ACT—RAW WOOL.

The specific duty of 11 cents a pound on raw wool is altered in this bill to an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. A specific duty has been the cause of great injustice to the manufacturers who use heavy shrinkage wool. Variations in shrinkage of wool are very great, extending from 20 per cent of its weight to 80 per cent, the average American wool shrinking about 60 per cent. This specific duty means that the importers of heavy shrinkage wool are at a great disadvantage, and that the manufacturers who might use it bear so high a tax as to largely prevent its use or to stimulate the adoption of shoddy and cheaper materials.

The year 1910 showed that of raw wool there was imported $47,687,293.20, on which was collected a revenue of $21,128,728.24, at an ad valorem rate of 44.31 per cent. It is expected that the importations of wool will be sufficiently stimulated under the present law to increase it to $66,991,000, on which, at the rate of 20 per cent provided in this bill, there will be collected in revenues the sum of $13,398,200.

NOILS, SHODDY, AND WASTE.

Shoddy, waste, and rags have placed on them the same duty as that on wool—20 per cent. Many of these articles are the raw materials for certain mills, and their lowering in price from an ad valorem rate under the Payne bill of 38.96 per cent to 20 per cent should greatly lessen the tax on the consumer. The present duties on importations of shoddy are practically prohibitive. In this last year only 30 pounds of shoddy were imported which bore an ad valorem duty of 375 per cent, a return to the Government of the magnificent revenue of $7.50.

On the entire importations under this schedule, amounting in 1910 to $203,509.25, duties were paid of $79,293, at an ad valorem rate of 38.96 per cent. Under the proposed act it is estimated that the importations will reach $890,500, which, at the rate of 20 per cent, will produce a revenue of $178,100.

COMBED WOOL AND TOPS.

Tops constitute the second process in the manufacture of cloth. One of the few changes in the act of 1909 is the insertion of a special paragraph on the duty on tops. Prior to this enactment tops were not separately reported. It is to be expected that the ad valorem rate on tops would be low, as they are one of the raw materials entering into manufacture. The present duty, however, is practically a prohibitive one, and last year there were imported only $1,129.80 worth, which resulted in an equivalent ad valorem rate of 105.19 per cent. This is reduced to 25 per cent. The imports of tops have been so insignificant and the present duty is so largely prohibitive that it has been very difficult to obtain a point for a revenue rate. Even under the present rate, however, it is estimated that the present importation will not be extensive.

YARN.

The present act provides a compound and ad valorem duty for yarns, of which in the last year there were imported $326,886.02 worth, which resulted, under the tariff, in an equivalent ad valorem rate of 82.38 per cent. This duty is practically prohibitive. This is especially so of the duties on cheaper yarns. While the act of 1901 made a slight change in the rates, it amounted to nothing, as the imports were still absolutely insignificant. The imports of yarns, valued at not more than 30 cents per pound, for the fiscal year June 30, 1910, consisted of only 127 pounds, worth $28, on which was paid a duty amounting to 159.75 per cent ad valorem. As with the yarns used in the cheaper form of cloths, their prohibitive duties added greatly to the expense of the finished product. As practically all the yarns imported were over 30 cents per pound, the specific duty became a constantly diminishing burden as the class of yarns grew more expensive.

CLOTHS AND KNIT FABRICS.

On cloths and knit fabrics a duty is placed of 40 per cent. This is the section on which occurred the largest importations in the present act, except the section providing for women's and children's clothing. The results for the year ending June 30, 1910, show importations of $6,658,288.07, on which the Government collected a tax of $6,465,884.31, or an ad valorem rate equivalent to 97.11 per cent. It is estimated that the decrease in duty of 40 per cent contemplated by this act will produce an increase in importation of $24,062,400, from which will be collected a revenue of $9,624,900.

This schedule at present is one of those to which is applied the compound duties as well as the division into classes. The cloths are divided into three classes—those valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, those valued between 40 and 70 cents per pound, and those valued at over 70 cents per pound. The first class have a duty of 33 cents per pound specific and 50 per cent ad valorem; the second class, 44 cents per pound and 50 per cent ad valorem; and the third class, 44 cents per pound and 55 per cent ad valorem.

In 1910 the importations under the first class amounted to only $2,111, on which was collected a tax of $3,040.88, or an ad valorem rate of 144.05 per cent. In the second class there were imported $274,246.50, on which were cleared a duty of $338,831.44, at an ad valorem rate of 123.55. In the third class were imported $5,827,776.89, on which were collected duties of $5,595,877.18, at an ad valorem rate of 96.02 per cent.

The present arrangement contains the double objection of having a compound rate and also of having a classification which stimulates to undervaluations. In addition to this, it would be seen by these tables that the highest tax is levied on the cheapest clothing. The more expensive cloths coming in under the highest schedule are imported under the least rate of duty, whereas the cheaper cloths, which clothe the poorer people, have imposed on them practically a duty which is almost 50 per cent greater than that on the more expensive fabrics, and the duty on such lower fabrics is practically prohibitive, as only the trifling amount of $2,000 were imported.

No better illustration could be given of the inequalities of this tariff bill than this schedule on cloth, and it effects the double purpose of hiding the real protection and of placing the highest burden of taxation on the poorest people. The table, as appears by the wording of the act, consists of an ad valorem duty of 50 per cent, plus a compensatory duty of 44 cents, which is supposed to compensate for the duty of 11 cents per pound on raw wool. That a much larger rate is really imposed a glance at the cost of manufacture will show.

DUTY ON ORDINARY CLOTH.

A piece of ordinary cloth, such as is used in men's clothing, is taken as an illustration. The price per yard on this cloth is 70 cents in England, on which the freight to New York or Boston is 1 cent per yard. At the rate at which it is imported the duty is 44 cents per pound, which is 23 cents for each yard placed, an ad valorem duty of 50 per cent, or 38 cents for each yard. This makes the total duty amount to 61 cents per yard, which is 78 per cent of the import price. Three and one-half yards of cloth are required to make a man's suit; hence the tariff tax on one suit made out of this cloth amounts to $2.14, and the price of the American or competing fabric is increased by the exact amount of this tariff. The cost of production of this article in America is divided as follows:

	Per cent.
Labor	25
Material	60
Interest and depreciation	7½
All other charges	7½

The protection given this article is not, therefore, actually 50 per cent, but is 78 per cent, which is more than three times the entire labor cost and only slightly below the total cost of labor and material.

On the estimate of 5 persons to a family of the 92,000,000 of people in the United States, there must be 18,400,000 who would be men using a suit of clothes of this nature. Estimating an equal number of women with men, and that the remaining three-fifths of the people are children who use one-fifth as much cloth, there would be used in the United States 171,200,000 yards of cloth. This tariff tax, therefore, of 61 cents per yard means a tax of $104,400,000 paid by the people yearly under this provision of the tariff. The cutting of this schedule from its present ad valorem rate of 94.11 per cent to 45 per cent should be a boon to every consumer in this country.

The following figures show how the present duty on woolens bears heaviest on the cheaper grade of goods and so places on the wage-earner the heaviest tax, e. g., cloth and knit goods:

The average article costing 40 cents per pound pays a duty of	$0.53
The average article costing 80 cents per pound pays a duty of	.88
The average article costing 99 cents per pound pays a duty of	.99
The average article costing $1.20 per pound pays a duty of	1.10

Note that at 40 cents per pound the duty is in excess of the cost of the article, but that at $1.20 the duty is less than the cost.

BLANKETS AND FLANNELS.

Blankets and flannels have a present rate of duty imposed on them amounting to 95.57 per cent, the total importations of which in the last year amounted to $168,889.82, on which was collected an import duty of $161,412.70. The proposed act cuts the present rate of duty to 30 per cent, except on flannels above 50 cents per pound, on which the duty shall be 45 per cent. The duty under the present act on the cheaper class of blankets is practically prohibitive. The two classes together imported during the last year only $1,162.50, at an ad valorem rate of from 93.58 to 105.50 per cent. The only importations were those of the highest-class blankets, and even they did not reach a large amount.

The new paragraph applies only one ad valorem duty to blankets and two different ad valorem rates to flannels. The more expensive flannels are practically a different sort of fabric than the cheaper ones, and it was thought that a greater tax could fairly be levied on their consumption. Of this class in the last year, June 30, 1910, 89.44 per cent of all the imports of flannels were valued at over 50 cents per pound.

WOMEN'S AND CHILDREN'S DRESS GOODS.

The duty is placed on women's and children's dress goods at 45 per cent ad valorem. In the previous year importations of $9,218,374.10 paid duties amounting to $9,481,206.75, equivalent to an ad valorem rate of 102.85 per cent. It is estimated that the bill under consideration will raise from this section a revenue of $11,433,800 on importations of $25,408,500, and at a rate of 45 per cent. The new paragraph places only one ad valorem duty on all classes of goods and takes the place of a complicated and intricate system of rates applied under the Payne Act, which divided the importations into classes and applied to each class a specific rate and compound rate. The Payne bill made little or no change in this paragraph over the Dingley Act, except to slightly raise the duties in one particular and impose on them duties averaging 102.85 per cent.

READY-MADE CLOTHING.

The Payne tariff left this section as it was in its predecessor, and last year there was collected from it a revenue of $1,444,296.87 on imports of $1,176,236.34, or equivalent to an ad valorem rate of 81.31 per cent. The bill under consideration estimates to raise from this act a revenue of $2,279,900 on estimated importations of $5,066,400, and applies to everything in the section a rate of 45 per cent. This lowering of the rate cuts the rate down on the more expensive clothing about one-half and on the less expensive clothing much more than that.

WEBBINGS AND SUSPENDERS.

Webbings and suspenders have placed on them by this act a duty of 35 per cent, and the intricacies of compound duties and division into classes existing in the present law are done away with. This rate at present is nearly prohibitive, and last year importations of $77,161.70 furnished the Treasury of the Government with a revenue of $67,174.54 on an ad valorem basis of duties of 87.06 per cent. It is estimated that the importations will increase to $160,900 under the present bill, on which will be collected duties of $56,300, and result in a slight loss of revenue in this paragraph.

CARPETS AND CARPETING.

The duties are placed at from 25 to 50 per cent, and take the place of duties ranging from 60.57 to 76.29 per cent. The present classes and complicated schedules are done away with and the duties are arranged so as to place on the cheaper forms of carpet the lightest proportion of taxes, a duty of 50 per cent being placed on carpets woven for rooms, or rugs of the most expensive character. The figures for last year show total importations of carpets and carpeting of $4,619,169.68, on which was collected the sum of $2,802,211.52. It is estimated that the proposed act will produce a revenue of $2,887,565 on estimated importations of $5,877,420. The following table shows the revenue derived from the McKinley, Wilson, and Payne Tariff Acts and those estimated for a 12-months' period under the proposed law:

[3] Approximately.

The people of our country have in most instances to face such climatic conditions as to make woolen clothes a necessity, and the protection from the weather which they afford is as needful as food or any other article of necessity. The results of the present law, as can be seen by the comparisons which I have given of the importations and revenues collected, show the enormous burden of taxation which the present high duties place on the shoulders of the people. Should the law we propose be enacted, it will be to our people a tremendous saving.

INCREASE IN COST OF CLOTHING.

The exactions of Schedule K can be escaped by no one, and the Massachusetts House report No. 1750, made in 1910, on the cost of living, treats so thoroughly the subject that its conclusions and opinions are regarded as authority. In its report this commission shows the percentage of total expenditure of a family for clothes ranges from around 7 to 20 per cent, increasing with the income up to a certain point. The average expenditure for clothes would seem to be about 12 to 14 per cent, or about one-eighth of the total. A reduction of 52 per cent, as contemplated by this bill, would mean a reduction of approximately from 6 to 7 per cent in the expenditures of every wage earner of our country on this basis, according to the basis of this commission. The report further states, page 148:

The general conclusion is that in the past five years the advance * * * in woolen clothing has been at least 20 per cent, and besides the retailer has taken a less margin of profit.

BURDEN LIFTED.

To indicate what a burden this will lift from the shoulders of every man, woman, and child in the United States let us see what saving there would have been to the people of the United States had the present rates been applied to the importations during the last year.

The total importations in 1910 of dress goods amounted to $9,218,374.10, on which was collected a duty of $9,481,206.75, the duty collected under the Payne Act. Had the rates of duty imposed by this bill been in effect the duty on these goods would have been $4,148,268.34, a total saving to the people in the cost of dress goods of $5,332,938.41.

In wearing apparel there was imported $1,776,236.34 worth, on which was collected a duty of $1,444,296.87. Had the proposed rates been in effect there would have been collected $799,206.35, a saving under this provision of $645,090.52.

Of the total cloths of woolen and worsted, there were imported $6,104,140.39, on which was collected the sum of $5,037,753.72. Had the present rates been in effect there would have been collected $2,441,656.15, a saving of $3,496,097.57.

On the item of raw wool the importations were $47,687,293.20, on which was collected $21,128,728.74. At the present rate of 20 per cent there would have been collected $9,537,558.64, a saving of $11,591,170.10 to the consumers.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has referred to the number of sheep in the various sections. Will he state, if he has the figures, the number of sheep in Ohio the year prior to the enactment of the Wilson law, and the number of sheep one year after?

Mr. PETERS. With pleasure. I have not the table which gives the number of sheep in the gentleman's State. The total number of sheep in 1894 was 45,048,000. In 1898 the total number of sheep was 37,657,000.

Now, the total number of sheep in Australia during this same year, 1894, was 100,411,461, and in 1898 it had decreased to 79,237,002 sheep. There was no duty on wool in Australia, which shows even a greater decrease than do the statistics for the United States at that time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I regret very much that the gentleman has not the figures that I asked of him. I can not state accurately from memory, but, generally speaking, the number of sheep in Ohio fell from 4,000,000 the year before the passage to about 1,000,000 the year after the passage of the Wilson law.

Mr. PETERS. Yes; as they did all over the world. I will insert in my speech the number of sheep in Australia during the successive years:

Number of sheep in Australia, 1890 to date.

1890	97,881,221
1891	106,421,068
1892	103,272,068
1893	99,535,889
1894	100,411,461
1895	90,689,727
1896	90,615,847
1897	82,643,578
1898	79,237,002
1899	72,347,500
1900	70,602,995
1901	72,040,211
1902	53,668,347
1903	56,932,705
1904	65,823,918
1905	74,403,704
1906	83,687,655
1907	87,650,263
1908	87,043,266
1909	91,676,281

This shows also that the sheep in Australia with no duty have increased enormously from 1901 to 1909, while they have decreased from 59,757,000 in 1901 to 57,216,000 in 1910 in the United States, though protected by a heavy duty.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will that bring it up to the last year?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not true that the sheep business has been traveling westward not only before the Wilson bill was passed but ever since?

Mr. PETERS. Without doubt. It is conclusively shown that the duty on wool does not prevent the decrease or growth in the number of sheep in the Eastern States, where other forms of farming prove more profitable. There are other circumstances than the tariff which account for the change in the number of sheep and for the moving of the sheep industry westward.

Mr. LONGWORTH. At least, however, the gentleman will admit the tariff was probably a significant circumstance at that time, inasmuch as the number of sheep fell within less than two years from 4,000,000 to 1,000,000 and the price of sheep fell, in round numbers, from about $5 to $1 and the price of wool, according to the gentleman's own statement, about 50 per cent, from about 28 cents a pound to about 17 cents a pound. I will state further that immediately after the enactment of the Dingley law the number of sheep immediately increased in Ohio and the price of wool nearly doubled, so that the tariff must have had, even according to the gentleman's statement, a good deal to do with that.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the main factors in the price of wool are not the tariff, but the change in the industry, the increase or decrease in the value of the land which makes sheep raising more or less profitable, and if it were only the tariff and not the general commercial circumstances and conditions which were prevalent over all the world at that time—if it were not for that, we should see differences instead of similarity between this country and Australia in the sheep raising during the nineties.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Then, following out that line of thought, has the gentleman figured how soon we will come to that point when we will not be raising any wool at all?

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I have not the time to go into an exhaustive discussion of the raising of sheep. I presume sheep will always be raised as an incidental farm product in much of our country. They may be the principal product in certain parts of our country, where it will not be profitable on account of transportation facilities or of the rocky condition of the soil or for other reasons to engage in agricultural or of farming other than sheep raising.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Does it not follow we will finally have to come to some other fabric than wool for clothing?

Mr. PETERS. I do not see that it does at all. It will mean our farmers will take up and devote their attention and capital to forms of agriculture which will be more profitable, and that is the reason woolgrowing has declined, in the face of a duty—owing to the fact that more and more profitable fields of agriculture have opened out and that the man who owned sheep found that it was more profitable to use his land and put his capital into raising other animals or into some other form of agriculture. The Wilson bill can not be held responsible for the reduction of the number of sheep, for during the nineties the number of sheep in Australia decreased by 30,000,000, and, also, there is no reason to suppose that the reduction of the present duty to 20 per cent will deplete our flocks. During the last 20 years we have increased in North America 50 per cent in population, while the number of sheep has increased only 4.8 per cent.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I agree with the gentleman there has been a decrease in the number of sheep, except in the United States we have increased the number nearly 50 per cent in the last 14 years, but the point I am making is this: The gentleman says that the sheep industry has been moving westward. Now, there is a limit to westward, and therefore will not the sheep industry have to get out, unless something is done to foster the sheep industry in this country, and will we not be forced finally to wear something else than woolen clothes?

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the sheep industry is given up where it is more profitable for the farmer to enter into some other form of agriculture, and it is a saving to the people at large to have the other more intensive and more profitable forms of agriculture cultivated in this country rather than to have a tax on the consumers of wool, to foster an industry on certain parts of the country where the soil could be more profitably employed. While the raising of sheep may move westward, it does so very largely, as I understand, because the industry in certain Western States has been developed, and, at the same time, in the East the more profitable forms of agriculture have displaced the raising of sheep.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In the report, on page 11, submitted by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, stress is laid upon the fact that the cost of producing sheep in Ohio is larger than in other districts in the country.

Now, I will ask the gentleman this question: If he knew that a 20 per cent duty, as provided in this bill, was less than the difference in the cost of production of wool in Ohio and abroad, and therefore necessarily under the 20 per cent rate it will be impossible to raise sheep profitably in Ohio, would he, nevertheless, vote for the 20 per cent rate?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly not. I do not believe the people of this country who consume the woolen goods should be taxed in order to make an industry profitable where it would not naturally exist, and I——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think the gentleman answered my question exactly as he intended. He said, "Certainly not"—that is to say, that he would not vote for the 20 per cent duty. Perhaps the gentleman misunderstood my question, which was this: That if he knew the 20 per cent duty was not sufficiently high to equalize the difference in the cost of production of wool in Ohio and abroad, would he, nevertheless, vote for the 20 per cent duty?

Mr. PETERS. The cost of production of sheep would have nothing to do in determining what I should vote for as a duty on raw wool.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The cost of production would be no element whatever in the gentleman's mind?

Mr. PETERS. No; none. I did not at first hear the gentleman's question clearly. I would answer "Certainly" instead of "Certainly not" to his previous question.

RAW WOOL.

We are now importing 46 per cent of the wool we produce. In the last 20 years the production of wool in this country has increased but 4.8 per cent in North America, while the growth in population has been 50.8 per cent. Even the duty of 11 cents on wool has failed to prevent a decrease in the number of sheep in practically all the sections of the country, except the Rocky Mountain States, there being 59,757,000 sheep in 1901 and 57,216,000 in 1910.

The fact that the duty of 11 cents has failed to stimulate the growing of wool to keep pace with the ever-increasing demand shows it is not fitted to the economic circumstances of this country except in a few localities, which are totally inadequate to furnish sufficient wool for general consumption, and the added cost of a tariff brings little into the hands of the wool growers while it places on the backs of our people a much greater added cost in all the garments which they consume.

The only groups of States in which the number of sheep have increased are the West North Central, which, in 1880, had 3,096,000 sheep as compared with 3,566,000 in 1910. The other group of States that saw an increase was the "Mountain States," which, in 1880, reported 7,098,000 sheep, in 1910, 18,338,000 sheep.

In all the States east of the Mississippi the number of sheep decreased from 21,058,684 in 1870 to 11,329,000 in 1910.

NUMBER OF SHEEP IN UNITED STATES UNDER WILSON AND DINGLEY TARIFFS.

It is claimed, as we have heard on the floor of this House today, that the hardships of the woolgrowers in 1894 and the years following were all owing to free wool, but I repeat that the Wilson bill can not be held responsible for the reduction of the number of sheep in this country, for during the nineties the number of sheep in Australia decreased by 30,000,000. And, also, how do those who criticise the present bill on the ground that the reduction of the duty on wool to 20 per cent will deplete our flocks, and who claim that if it had not been for the Wilson law we would now have sufficient sheep in this country to supply all our demands for raw wool—how, I ask, do these critics reconcile the fact that the decrease in the number of sheep while the Wilson bill was in effect was only about half the decrease that took place in one-half the time under the Dingley law? I append the following table to show the decrease in the number of sheep in the United States from 1893–1897 and 1903–1905.

[Statistical Abstract, 1909.]

1893. Largest number from 1886 to 1893	47,273,553

1903	63,964,876
1905	45,170,423
Decrease in number of sheep	18,894,453

The producer of wool who, with a protection of not less than 44 per cent, has been unable to produce to within 44 per cent of the raw wool needed to supply the American manufacturer can not complain of the reduction in the duty on wool to 20 per cent—a duty that is still unique.

The producers of woolen manufactures will be placed on an equal footing by this bill. The closed home market—one that has come to import but 3 per cent of its woolen goods—will be opened up to a wholesome foreign competition, and the reduction in the cost of raw materials will make it possible for the American manufacturer to extend his market; and there is every reason to believe that the insignificant exportation of manufactures of wool in this country will materially grow far beyond the present exports, which are but two-fifths of 1 per cent of our production of woolens.

The two following tables show our dependence on foreign wools and the practically closed market in this country for woolens produced abroad and the pitifully small demand for our woolen goods by other countries; also the contrast is shown between the policy of the United States in this matter compared with the other leading producers of woolens.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORMS.

The Democratic Party has stood always for a tariff for revenue only. Let me quote you from past Democratic platforms:

SOME QUOTATIONS FROM DEMOCRATIC PLATFORMS.

1880. * * * and a tariff for revenue only. (Only mention made of the tariff in this platform.)

1884. * * * We demand that Federal taxation shall be exclusively for public purposes.

1892. We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purpose of revenue only. * * *

1896. We hold that the tariff duties should be levied for purposes of revenue. * * *

1904. We favor a revision and a gradual reduction of the tariff by the friends of the masses and for the common weal and not by the friends of its abuses, its extortions, and its discriminations, keeping in view the ultimate end of "equality of burdens and equalities of opportunities" and the constitutional purpose of raising a revenue by taxation, to wit, the support of the Federal Government in all of its integrity and virility, but in simplicity.

All straightforward utterances, which constitute a pledge to the people of this country that the Democratic Party will perform to the letter.

REPUBLICAN TARIFF.

The basic principle which underlies any tariff which the Republican Party supports is that "the measure of protection should at least equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad" (quoted from the Republican platform, 1908), and to be sure to give full measure to the manufacturing interests of this country it is generally added that the tariff should also insure a "reasonable profit" along with equalizing cost of production.

This policy, in fact any tariff policy other than one for revenue only, is as absurd as it is indefinite; it is absurd, for it must result in one of two things, either absolutely prohibitory duties against foreign goods that would compete with us, or it must result in discrimination and favoritism. The Republican tariff policy is indefinite and unsatisfactory, for it is impossible to estimate with any degree of accuracy the difference in the cost of production here and abroad. And what political party can be intrusted with the commission of seeing that all of our manufactures receive uniform profits? For such would be the result if the term "reasonable profits," which the Republican Party uses so glibly, had any real significance.

Let me quote you several authorities on this question of the impracticability of determining the difference of costs here and abroad.

The President of the United States, in a letter to the chairman of the Republican congressional committee last August (1910), after the Tariff Board had begun its inquiry, said:

Moreover, when we understand that the cost of production differs in one country from that in another, and that it changes from year to year and from month to month, we must realize that the precise difference in cost of production sought for is not capable of definite ascertainment, and that all that even the most scientific person can do in his investigation is, after consideration of many facts which he learns, to exercise his best judgment in reaching a conclusion.

Similar statements have been made by members of the Tariff Board. Chairman Emery, in a speech before the Chicago Association of Commerce, December 3, 1910, said:

It is unfortunate that so much emphasis has been laid on the question of getting relative costs, since many people have assumed this to be both an easy task and a complete solution of the question. Any practical man knows that both these assumptions are faulty. One of the most difficult problems which a manufacturer has to solve in his own business is to determine the cost of any individual article which he produces. In fact, it would not be unreasonable for a manufacturer to respond to a request from such a body as ours for his costs of production, "I would give them to you if I could get them, and I am willing to pay you a good sum if you will find them out for me."

ASCERTAINING COST OF PRODUCTION IMPOSSIBLE.

The fact that the Republicans are unable to get at the basis of the cost of production on which they would place the tariff rates is sufficient to condemn their program, even if they were not working upon a theory that is contrary to all the principles of economics and good sense. According to the Republican idea, "the less able we are to produce an article, the more duty is levied" in order to encourage the industry by equalizing differences of cost here and abroad. The result is that the things that we are fitted to do economically are left to themselves to prosper as best they can, while the industries that we are least able to run economically under normal conditions are encouraged by the highest duties, leading to an increased cost for the consumer and to a bad commercial adjustment.

ABSOLUTELY PROHIBITIVE TARIFF THE CONCLUSION.

Should it be attempted to raise a tariff sufficient to meet the difference in cost at any point of production in the United States of articles, long before this point is reached the tariff will be so high as to be absolutely prohibitive, and its logical application would mean that there would be no importations whatever, or, if some limitation is made, what section of the country and what industries are to be given the rates required to stimulate production within its borders and give its manufacturers "a reasonable profit."

COST OF LIVING.

There has been an ever-increasing cost of living, which has made it more and more difficult for the wage-earner to meet with his income the needs of his family. The Democratic Party, true to its promises, has taken a most important step by passing the reciprocity agreement with Canada, which, in effect, should tend to lessen the cost of the food products in our cities. To further carry out its pledges this bill is proposed, which will remove a tax from the shoulders of every man, woman, and child in our country. It is hoped that more schedules may be taken up at a later date to further carry out the lowering of the tariff and the arranging of the taxes on a basis fair to all. The revenue basis to which the tariff will be lowered and the removal of taxes on raw materials should place our manufacturing on a sound basis, enlarge its markets, and by increasing the demand for labor give the wage earner steady employment at just rates. To the consumer a lowering of the tariff duties must bring an ever-increasing benefit.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Chairman, this country's trade has, up to the present time, been largely in the export of products from the soil, exports which show only in a small way the value of our people's industry, but which draw each year more and more on the resources of our country. We have seen the exportation of agricultural products decrease as the demand for them at home increased. To stimulate our trade, to provide employment for our people, to provide cheaper living to the wage earners of this country is a problem to which the parties must address themselves, and to lower the cost of living is the problem to which the Democratic Party has devoted its attention. We do not believe in a tariff as a benefit. We believe in it as a tax. The Democratic Party stands squarely for a tariff for revenue only, a tariff which will lay on the consumers the least burden and arranges its rates, not as gifts for favored supporters of any party, but as taxes to be so placed that the revenues of the Government may be collected with as little burden as possible to its people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON].

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to show that the proposed law is in the main in accord with the Republican national platform in reference to a revision of the tariff; that the proposed law is more nearly a compliance with our platform than the existing law.

That the oft-repeated statement that we can not lower the tariff, as demanded by the people and as promised to the people by both parties, is wholly untrue in point of fact; that we can get all the needed revenue from tobacco alone, which is clearly a luxury, the present tax on which being insignificant compared with the tax on other luxuries, and even with such necessaries of life as sugar, wool, and woolen goods, and so forth.

That if we were to restore the internal-revenue tax on tobacco contained in either the law of 1879 or the law of 1875, the Government would get ample revenue to more than supply all the revenue that we would lose by a proper revision of the tariff and by placing sugar on the free list. If the law of 1879 had been in force last year, our receipts from the internal-revenue tax on tobacco would have been $138,050,930, as against $58,118,457 we actually received. If the law of 1875 had been in force last year the revenue would have been $178,094,457, as against $58,118,457, the revenue actually received. The tax provided by these laws was reduced solely because we did not need the revenue.

That our tax on tobacco is only one-fifth to one-fifteenth of the tax assessed by the leading European countries, who consume the major portion of all the tobacco we export.

That if we were to increase the tax on tobacco it would not affect the farm price of tobacco or affect anyone interested in the tobacco business, but would affect the consumers, who should pay the tax.

I shall vote for the proposed bill, and desire to state, briefly, the reasons that prompt me to do so. The tariff affecting wool and woolen goods remains, I am informed, about the same as that adopted 43 years ago. It was established, in the first instance, and for many years maintained on the ground that it was essential in order to build up and promote this industry. For the past few years its friends have urged and insisted that it should be maintained in order to protect this great industry from foreign competition. When first enacted, its friends claimed that the time would come, and at no great distant date, when the tariff could be materially reduced, if not entirely taken off. It would seem as though the time ought to be at hand when these industries having enjoyed this large tariff for more than 40 years should be in a condition to permit a very material reduction of the tariff, such as we have before us.

But it is urged that if we reduce this tariff to the point proposed in the bill we will bring financial disaster to those engaged in this industry. I do not believe that any such results will follow from the enactment of this bill into law. I do not believe that there is any such difference between the cost of manufacturing woolen goods here and abroad as contained in our present tariff. I regret exceedingly that we have not before us the report of our so-called Tariff Board on this question, so that we could get from an entirely disinterested body the real facts about this very important matter.

The essential facts relative to the comparative cost of manufacturing woolen goods here and abroad can be ascertained by a tariff board, and I have felt as though this matter might go over until next session in hopes that we might get a report from the Tariff Board by that date, when we could reach a more intelligent conclusion. I would feel much more strongly in favor of this procedure if it were not for the fact that these manufacturers have for years consistently fought the establishment of a tariff board. If it had not been for their opposition, we long before this would have had a properly constituted tariff board, and would have at hand all necessary information.

If the friends of the present tariff on this schedule had been one-half as active in urging heretofore the passage of a proper Tariff Board law as they have been active in opposing it, or if they had exerted their influence in trying to secure a report of our present so-called Tariff Board, we would have, at least, some of the essential facts before us to revise intelligently this schedule and to enable us to be certain that we were enacting a law fair and just alike to the consumer and to the manufacturer.

There is no inclination on the part of the people of this country to reduce the tariff to a point where the laboring man of the country can not be employed in the industries affected by this bill and receive a fair return for his employment. There is no demand for a reduction of the tariff to a point where the manufacturer can not continue to operate his factory and pay the wages that he has been accustomed to pay. But there is a widespread and, I think, a well-founded belief that the present tariff is very much in excess of the amount necessary to do this, and a very urgent demand that a reduction on the woolen schedule be made.

The people of this country are not in the mood to take the statement of those vitally interested parties as to what the tariff should be. They want to get the information from men of ability and skill who are entirely disinterested in the conclusions they reach.

I want to warn those interested in this schedule, as well as other schedules, that if they resist the creation of a Tariff Board with ample powers, with sufficient inducements to obtain men of excellent ability and experience as commissioners, they may get a tariff law that will write the schedules too low and bring real, not imaginary, hardships upon them. Our great industries have nothing whatsoever to fear from the conclusions of such a Tariff Board, and when they resist the creation of such a board it must occur to every man of experience that there is something about the operation of this tariff law in their favor that they desire to conceal.

It is wholly incomprehensible to me that the manufacturers of wool have not been able to keep pace with the manufacturers in other lines of industry and are not more able to cope with foreign competition than they claim they are. The cost of manufacturing in every other line of industry has grown cheaper year by year as improved methods and improved machinery have been adopted, and it would seem more than passing strange if those engaged in the woolen manufactures have not had the same experience. We can much more nearly compete with European manufacturers in everything else than we could 40 years ago. Why not in woolen goods? Our production and consumption of woolen goods have increased enormously in the past 40 years. Should not the same law prevail there as works elsewhere in the manufacture of goods that the larger the production the less the cost of production?

If we are not able to materially reduce the tariff enacted 43 years ago, when may we expect to arrive at the point where we may reduce it? We can not afford to maintain indefinitely these enormous rates. Those interested in the schedule we are considering fight the reduction of it even a penny. They fight the reduction of the tariff on this schedule even more strongly than they fought for its original enactment. I do not know how the conduct of these beneficiaries of our high tariff impresses others, but they impress me as a lot of freebooters who are bent on maintaining this unnecessarily high tariff regardless of right or wrong, regardless of the hardships it works on the great mass of our people. They have enjoyed this tariff so long, they have exacted tribute from every person so long, that they seem to regard it as a vested right to continue to do so. When they tell us it can not be materially lowered, or lowered at all, they convince me of their insincerity. They persuade me that their statements are wholly unreliable.

But it is my duty to vote for or against this measure. If we defeat this measure, our present existing tariff law will remain in force. It is encumbent upon me to decide whether the proposed law more nearly complies with that we promised the country in our national platform than the existing law. I believe that the present tariff on wool and woolen goods is entirely too high. If it was fair in 1867, it is altogether too high now. I do not believe that there is any justification for a tariff on any necessity of life, such as clothing, as high or anywhere near as high as 90 per cent ad valorem. I do not believe there is anything like 90 per cent difference between the cost of manufacturing woolen goods in this country and elsewhere. I do not believe there is one-half of that difference. The best information that I have been able to obtain goes to show that there is no such difference.

I believe that the proposed law comes very much nearer complying with our national platform than our existing law. I do not mean to say that the proposed law is exactly correct. I do not know whether it is or not, and I do not believe there is a man in this House who does know exactly what the rate should be, or ever will know, until we get such reliable information as we could obtain if we had a proper Tariff Board, that had given full and ample time to the obtaining of the necessary information.

My people are in favor of a very material reduction on woolen goods. They believe that the tariff on this schedule has been maintained at too high a figure for many years. I promised my people in every speech that I made that if I had the opportunity I would vote for a bill reducing materially the tariff on our woolen schedule, and I am going to keep my word. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I favor the bill because I believe it is strictly a protective measure. None could have been drawn that in every particular recognizes the essential doctrine of a protective policy more than this bill does. Republicans may disagree as to whether the rate is too high or too low, but all will admit that it is a bill based on protective principles. I shall vote for it because it is protective in its nature, and, as nearly as I am able to judge, it meets as nearly as possible the doctrine of protection as announced in the Chicago platform of three years ago. [Applause.] I believe it more nearly fixes this schedule on wool and woolen goods in accordance with our Republican doctrine than our present existing law. It certainly is not drawn with any reference to free trade or with any reference to the doctrine of tariff for revenue, if that doctrine means anything else than our protective doctrine under a different name.

THE OLD EXCUSE, "I CAN NOT VOTE FOR THE BILL BECAUSE THE GOVERNMENT CAN NOT AFFORD TO LOSE THE REVENUE."

Many Members are going to give as an excuse or as a reason for opposing this bill the old lame excuse that we have so often heard when a man is called upon to vote on bills affecting revenue—that he can not support them because the Government can not afford to lose the revenue. Others there are who say they would gladly favor a lower rate of duty on this schedule, but they can not because the Government can not afford to lose the revenue. Some free traders will say that they are in favor of placing wool on the free list, but not now, because the Government can not afford to lose the revenue.

Every time it is proposed to revise the tariff laws, or proposed to extend the rural free delivery of mail, or to enact any progressive legislation, the objection is at once raised that the revenues of the Government will not permit it. I will show in a moment that there is no basis for these claims.

I understand that some of our Democratic friends claim that they would be in favor of a still lower tariff on the articles mentioned in this bill but can not do so because the Government can not afford to lose the revenue. They are quite loud in their grief over the fact that the loss of revenue stands squarely in their path and will not permit them to vote as their judgment dictates, and such as they have long and loudly proclaimed they would do if ever given the opportunity. They assure us that the loss of revenue is the one thing that prevents them from writing into law the pure Democratic doctrine.

There are some of my Republican colleagues who feel that this bill is probably right from the standpoint of the last Republican platform, but this loss of revenue prevents them from supporting this bill. I do not want to challenge the good faith of these persons, but I want to say none the less positively that this is an excuse which has been made by every party in the last 30 years for failure to keep its promises in reference to revenue laws and a revision of the tariff. Whenever a party has failed to make good its promises and has been driven to the last ditch in defending its conduct, it has always made the plea that it could not have done otherwise and provided the Government with the essential revenue. There never has been a day in 30 years when any party could not have completely fulfilled its promises in the revision of our tariff or revenue laws, made every reduction promised the people, and yet supplied the Government with abundant revenue. I want to help uncover every man who is hiding behind any such defense. I want to show how utterly absurd such statements are. If there should be anyone who is going to defend his conduct by this flimsy, worn-out, threadbare excuse and vote on this bill contrary to the promises which he made to his people, contrary to the platform on which he was elected, whether he be Republican or Democrat, I want to assist in uncovering him. I want to show him he can not do it on the pretext of loss of revenue.

The question is not the loss of revenue—that must have been taken into consideration before our platforms were written—but is, Are we living up to our platforms? The Democratic Party, when it proclaimed its policy of free wool, proclaimed it on the theory that it could enact such a law and still supply the Government with the needed revenue. They knew then just as well as now that they would have to provide this revenue from some other source. They must have had this in mind when they made the declaration. This can not be changed by Gov. Wilson or any other Democratic candidate for President approving a different course at this late date. Does Gov. Wilson want the people of the United States to understand when the Democratic Party at its next convention declares its platform on the tariff that there is an unwritten proviso attached to it to the effect that it will carry out that plank only providing it can get the necessary revenue, or does he want the people to understand that the platform will mean exactly what it will say? I can not think that Gov. Wilson approves any such doctrine. It is contrary to his conduct in office and his record as governor in fulfilling party pledges. I am not advocating free wool. I believe in the protective policy.

I am only insisting in honesty in party platforms. I think this bill complies with the Republican and not the Democratic platform.

When the Republican Party announced the doctrine that it was in favor of a tariff on all manufactured articles which would equal the difference between the cost of production here and abroad, its leaders knew just as well then as now that in carrying out this policy all the revenue that would be lost by such a law would have to be supplied from some other source.

When the great leaders of the Republican or Democratic Party assemble and announce their policy with reference to a tariff law, or any other legislative matter, the people have the right to assume that they can fulfill every obligation that they voluntarily undertake, and that they make such promises with the full knowledge as to the effect it will have on the revenue, and that they can carry out their policies and provide for the loss of revenue elsewhere. So it is no excuse, it is an admission of bad faith, either in the making of the promise or in the fulfillment of it, for a party to say that it can not carry out its platform on account of a loss of revenue.

TOBACCO IS TAXED ONLY A SMALL PERCENTAGE OF OTHER LUXURIES.

Our Government has been throwing away millions upon millions of dollars annually that it ought to have and which it could easily get, and which would at once enable us to place sugar and rice on the free list and provide funds which would permit us to reduce the tariff on the woolen, cotton, and steel schedules to a point that the Republican Party promised that it would do in the last national platform.

A proper tax on tobacco would easily do this. Tobacco is not a necessity of life, but it is clearly and undisputably a luxury. Nothing that man consumes is more so. All civilized countries tax luxuries and tax them heavily. In raising the revenue of the Government the luxuries should be first taxed heavily, and then, if enough revenue can not be provided, other articles should be taxed; and lastly and least of all should the necessary food products, and especially those products that can not be raised in our country to a profit and advantage, be taxed.

No food product should be taxed which this country does not easily and naturally raise, and in sufficient quantity for the needs of the people. This is one phase of taxation that all governments and all political economists are agreed upon, and yet we tax this admitted luxury, tobacco, less than almost any other commodity in comparison with its actual value when sold on the market. It bears but a slight tax when compared with other luxuries. The internal-revenue tax on fermented liquor is the same to-day that it was at the highest point during the Civil War. It has never been lowered one penny. It was doubled during the Spanish War, but when that war was over the tax was restored to the point of the Civil War. Our war tax on distilled spirits was for a short time reduced from an average of about $1.50 to 60 cents a gallon in 1868.

In 1872 it was raised to 70 cents a gallon; in 1875 it was again raised to 90 cents a gallon; and in 1894 it was raised to $1.10 a gallon, and the tax has remained at the last figure ever since 1894. The tax on distilled liquors since 1894 has been about as high as the average tax during the Civil War. The tax on tobacco from its highest point during the Civil War has been lowered from year to year until it is now but a small fraction of that tax. The changes have been quite numerous, and I have prepared a table showing the rate and date of each law reducing the same. Smoking and chewing tobacco and snuff in each law are fixed at the same rate, there being one or two exceptions in relation to snuff, which I will not notice, so I will speak of them as tobacco. Cigars and cheroots have been taxed by each law at the same rate, and I will speak of them together as cigars. Cigarettes by each law have borne about one-half of the rate of cigars, so I will not especially mention them. I am discussing only the internal-revenue tax. I am not taking into consideration at all import or tariff duties.

[1] According to value.

Mr. PAYNE. What kind of tobacco is the gentleman talking about?

Mr. WARBURTON. Smoking tobacco and chewing tobacco. I stated that. I am not dealing at all with import duties; I am dealing with the internal-revenue tax. Now, we will observe that from the highest point during the war, 40 cents a pound, tobacco has been reduced to 8 cents a pound. Cigars at the highest point of the Civil War were $8 to $40, according to the value, per thousand; they were reduced to $3 a thousand in 1883, and they have remained at that point all the time, except during the Spanish War, when they were slightly raised.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman kindly state what the ad valorem was in addition——

Mr. WARBURTON. I am not taking into consideration the import duties; I am simply talking about the internal revenue.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, the internal revenue.

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes. So it clearly appears, while the tax on whisky or distilled spirits is about the same as that of the Civil War tax, and the tax on fermented liquors, beer, and ale is equal to that of the highest Civil War tax, our tax on tobacco has been reduced from time to time until it is but a fraction of the Civil War tax. Our present tax is not one-fourth of what it was during the Civil War and up to 1872; two-fifths of what it was from 1872 to 1875; one-third of what it was from 1875 to 1879; one-half of what it was from 1879 to 1883.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman again refer to internal revenue only?

Mr. WARBURTON. I say so in all my speeches.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is discussing the schedules of everything else but tobacco, and only the internal-revenue tax on tobacco?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes; we will call it the internal-revenue tax on tobacco. That is what I am discussing.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Do I understand the gentleman to advocate an increase in the internal-revenue taxes on tobacco and liquors, in order to decrease the duties on wool and the various other schedules?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes. I say you can provide all the revenue you lose on all such reductions by increasing the internal-revenue tax on tobacco alone. I am not referring to the tax on distilled spirits or liquors. That is as high as it was during the Civil War.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman advocates an increase in the internal-revenue taxation on tobacco, in order to lower the duty on wool and other products?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes; and to lower the duty on steel and cotton, and to get it all off of sugar.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman is not a protectionist. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARBURTON. I am.

Mr. GARRETT. Did the gentleman get his time from the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] or from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]? [Laughter.]

Mr. WARBURTON. The gentleman from New York was good enough to give me some of his time.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. I wanted, Mr. Chairman, to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], if the gentleman from Washington will yield a moment, that I might consume all my time by yielding to men who are honestly opposed to this bill, though they are sitting on the other side of the aisle, but who dare not speak against the edict of the Democratic caucus. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman from Washington will permit, I do not suppose the gentleman from New York meant to indicate by that that I had requested of him any time on that ground?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARBURTON. Now, gentlemen, if you will follow me closely, I shall not need to answer these questions again. I am simply discussing the increase of the internal-revenue tax on tobacco. The tax on sugar, for instance, controls absolutely, and is of the same effect as an internal-revenue or consumption tax on sugar. That might not prevail as to cotton and woolen goods. I will not undertake to say that it does. But I am simply calling your attention to the fact that you have not reduced the duties on woolen goods and cotton goods practically since the Civil War. You have not reduced the internal-revenue tax on beer. You have not reduced the internal-revenue tax on distilled spirits.

Now, tobacco is as much a luxury as any of those, and yet you have reduced it down to only 20 per cent of what it was in the Civil War. I have some illustrations for you, or will have in a moment, which, if you have not examined the subject, I think will be rather astounding to you.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has made any investigation as to the amount of revenue produced under the old rates and the amount produced under the subsequent rates after the tax was reduced?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes. I will cover that in just a moment, if the gentleman will wait that long. I had one of the experts of the Internal Revenue Bureau figure it out for me.

While the foregoing table shows that our tax on tobacco is but a pittance compared with what it was during the 20 years following the Civil War, and the tax is insignificant compared with the tax on other luxuries, it does not give one a full idea of what a small ad valorem tax it really is. For instance, this morning I bought a quarter of a pound of Edgeworth smoking tobacco. This is a common, ordinary smoking tobacco, which cost me 25 cents. The Government tax on this was 1½ cents. If the tax was doubled it would have cost me 26½ cents; if the tax was trebled, it would have cost me 28 cents; if it had been quadrupled, it would have cost me 29½ cents.

The Government tax on a 10-cent cigar is three-tenths of 1 cent; if it was doubled, a 10-cent cigar would cost 10.3 cents; if it was trebled, it would cost 10⅜ cents; and if it was quadrupled, it would cost less than 11 cents.

The tax on a 25-cent cigar is likewise three-tenths of 1 cent; if this tax were doubled, a 25-cent cigar would cost 25.3 cents; if it were trebled, it would cost 25⅜ cents; and if it were quadrupled, it would cost 25.9 cents.

If we were to increase our tax on tobacco 100 per cent, it would equal the tax in effect from 1879 to 1883; if we were to increase it 300 per cent, it would equal the tax in effect from 1875 to 1879; if we were to increase it 250 per cent, it would equal the tax in effect from 1872 to 1875; and if we were to increase it 400 per cent, it would then equal the tax in effect from 1864 to 1872.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. In giving the price of a cigar, the gentleman is assuming that each time the consumer of the cigar would have to pay the tax. As a matter of fact, I presume it would not make any difference. He would get a 10-cent cigar for 10 cents just the same.

Mr. WARBURTON. He probably would. It would probably have one-fiftieth less of tobacco in it.

Mr. NORRIS. And that would do the smoker just that much more good.

Mr. PAYNE. We might better tax it all out.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it might be a good thing, although I smoke as much as anybody.

Mr. WARBURTON. If we were to double the tax on a 50-cent cigar, it would then cost 50.3 cents; if it were trebled, it would cost 50⅜ cents; if it were quadrupled, it would cost 50.9 cents. It can be readily seen that to double or even to increase the tax 300 or 400 per cent the price to the consumer would not be materially increased. Even if we were to quadruple the price, the per cent of the tax on tobacco would not equal that which we have on a great many necessaries of life.

Our present rate on smoking tobacco, taking Edgeworth as an example, is 8 per cent of the selling price; if doubled, it would be 16 per cent of the selling price; if trebled, it would be 24 per cent; and if quadrupled, it would be 32 per cent of the selling price.

Our present tax on a 5-cent cigar is 6 per cent of the retail price; if doubled, it would equal 12 per cent; if trebled, it would equal 18 per cent; and if quadrupled, it would equal 24 per cent.

Our present tax on a 10-cent cigar equals 3 per cent of the retail price; if doubled, it would be 6 per cent; if trebled, it would equal 9 per cent; and if quadrupled, it would equal 12 per cent.

Our present tax on a 25-cent cigar is 1.2 per cent of the retail price; if doubled, it would equal 2.4 per cent; if trebled, it would equal 3.6 per cent; and if quadrupled, it would equal 4.8 per cent of the retail price.

Our present tax on a 50-cent cigar equals six-tenths of 1 per cent at retail price; if doubled it would equal 1.2 per cent; if trebled it would equal 1.8 per cent; and if quadrupled it would equal 2.4 per cent of the retail price.

Our tax on sugar represents about 36 per cent of the price of retail sugar in the city of Washington. The tariff is almost five times as much on a dollar's worth of sugar as the tax on a dollar's worth of smoking tobacco or on a dollar's worth of 5-cent cigars, 12 times as much as the tax on a dollar's worth of 10-cent cigars, 30 times as much as the tax on a dollar's worth of 25-cent cigars, and 60 times as great as the tax on $1 worth of 50-cent cigars.

When one of our millionaires buys a dollar's worth of 50-cent cigars he pays the Government six-tenths of 1 cent revenue; when he buys a dollar's worth of 25-cent cigars he pays the Government a revenue of 1.2 cents; when he buys a dollar's worth of two-for-a-quarter cigars he pays the Government in revenue 2.4 cents. When his gardener buys a dollar's worth of nickel cigars or of smoking tobacco he pays the Government a revenue of 8 cents; when his washerwoman buys $1 worth of granulated sugar at the market price in Washington—5½ cents a pound—she pays the Government a revenue of 36 cents; or, 36 cents is exacted from her on account of our tariff on that necessary of life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman submit just to an interruption?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know that I differ with the line of argument the gentleman is making, but it seems to me he omits to draw the distinction. If these cigars are imported, how much does the Government get?

Mr. WARBURTON. They would get——

Mr. HARDY. What is the import tax?

Mr. WARBURTON. I think it is $4.50 a thousand.

Mr. HARDY. Now, then, as to sugar, you are speaking of the import tax alone, and there is no indirect revenue tax on sugar.

Mr. WARBURTON. I do not know whether the gentleman read it or not, but the other day I showed conclusively, I think, that your tariff of $1.90 does, as a matter of fact, cost every consumer of sugar 2 cents a pound.

Mr. HARDY. I think you are exactly right, but this tax that you are speaking of tobacco paying to the Government direct is in addition to the protection given by the protective tariff on tobacco?

Mr. WARBURTON. The only place where my illustration would be at all faulty would be in the case of a 25 or a 50-cent cigar.

Mr. HARDY. Any cigar that is imported?

Mr. WARBURTON. Any cigar that is imported.

Mr. HARDY. In other words, this is an additional tax to the import tax?

Mr. WARBURTON. Now, I did not have time, and I can not go into that now, but from what little investigation I have made I am very free to say that I do not think that that would increase a 25-cent cigar 3 per cent.

Mr. HARDY. I want to say to the gentleman that I believe we can get revenue elsewhere without imposing these outrageous burdens.

Mr. WARBURTON. Snuff—common, ordinary snuff—sells for about 75 cents a pound and pays a tax of 8 cents a pound or a tax equal to 10 per cent of its retail price. Would it not be good, decent legislation to tax this not altogether delicate and refined luxury 36 cents per pound and thus raise our revenue $10,000,000 a year, and take this amount off of the tax on sugar and thus save about 20 per cent of our tax on sugar? This sum would almost equal the revenue we will lose on wool by the proposed bill.

That is exactly what would have been raised last year if we had had that tax on snuff; if we had raised it up to the price that it costs the poor woman when she has to buy a dollar's worth of sugar. Let the woman or man who wants to use snuff pay as large a percentage on the retail price as the poor woman does who has to buy sugar for herself and her children. This sum on snuff alone, raising it back to the Civil War tax, would pretty nearly provide all the revenue you lose by the passage of this bill.

For the fiscal year ending 1910 we received on our internal revenue from tobacco the sum of $57,889,000. If we were to double the internal-revenue tax, it would increase our revenue $57,889,000. If we were to treble it, it would increase our revenue $115,778,000.

If we double it, we make 25 cents' worth of smoking tobacco cost us 27 cents; a 5-cent cigar would cost us 5.3 cents; a 10-cent cigar would cost us 10.3 cents; a 12½-cent cigar would cost us 12.8 cents; and a 25-cent cigar, 25.3 cents.

If we treble it, it would make 25 cents' worth of smoking tobacco cost 29 cents; a 5-cent cigar cost 5.6 cents; a 10-cent cigar cost 10.6 cents; a 12½-cent cigar cost 13.1 cent; and a 25-cent cigar cost 25.6 cents.

If we were to double the tax on tobacco and cigars, we could place sugar and rice on the free list and have $6,000,000 to spare. If we should treble the tax on cigars and tobacco, we could take care of every possible loss that we would suffer by means of any proposed revision of the tariff and place sugar and rice on the free list.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, at my request, has given me in detail the amounts of smoking and chewing tobacco and snuff, cigars, and cigarettes that were withdrawn for consumption last year, so that I might determine what the revenues of the Government for the fiscal year ending 1910 would have been if the internal-revenue law of 1875 and the internal-revenue law of 1879 were in force. I shall add a table showing the results on each item as well as total results.

The internal revenue that we would have received for the amount of tobacco consumed last year if the internal-revenue tax of April, 1879, had been in force would have been, in round numbers, $138,000,000, as opposed to $58,000,000 actually received under our existing law. If the internal-revenue law of 1875 had been in force on the tobacco consumed last year, instead of the Government getting $58,000,000 it would have collected $178,000,000. It must be borne in mind that the tax in this law of 1879 was not reduced because it was too high, because there was any demand for the reduction of it by anyone interested in the industry or by the consumer, but because the Government found it necessary to reduce its income—to check its increasing surplus.

One can not make that too strong. The law of 1875, which, if it had been in force last year, would have increased our revenues $120,000,000, was never taken off at the request of any man who grew tobacco, at the request of any man who handled tobacco, or at the request of anyone. I do not doubt there are many of you here who will remember that it was taken off solely because we had more money coming into the Treasury than we knew what to do with, and we wanted to reduce the revenue.

The law of 1875 reduced the war tax 25 per cent; the law of 1879 further reduced the tax to about 50 per cent of the war tax. So there could be no excuse for the third reduction of 1883, which again reduced the tobacco tax to one-fourth of the Civil War tax, except the desire to still further reduce the revenue.

If the internal-revenue law of 1879 had been in force last year we would have received $80,000,000 more in revenue than we actually received. This would enable us to put sugar on the free list, the revenue of which amounted to $53,000,000 last year; put rice on the free list, the revenue of which amounted to $1,458,000 last year; and enact the present law, which it is admitted will cause a loss of $13,000,000, and still have $13,000,000 left.

If the internal-revenue law of 1875 had been in force last year we would have received $178,000,000 as opposed to $58,000,000, or we would have received $120,000,000 more than we actually did receive. This would enable us to place sugar and rice on the free list, reduce the revenue from wool and woolen goods one-half, which would amount to more than $21,000,000; cut off one-half of the tariff on cotton goods, which would amount to $19,000,000 in revenue; place iron and steel on the free list, which would cause a revenue loss of about $12,000,000, making a total reduction in revenue of about $107,000,000 and leave still a surplus of $13,000,000. It must be remembered in this connection that when we place sugar on the free list that we not only make a saving to the great masses of people of $53,000,000, the amount of revenue, but that we save them at least $85,000,000 more which is exacted of them by reason of the tariff.

The law of 1875, which fixed the tax I have just mentioned, reduced the war tax 25 per cent. So, when the law of 1875 was enacted, the rate on tobacco then was 75 per cent of what it was at the close of the war and for five years afterwards.

Mr. Beveridge, in his great speech on tobacco in the United States Senate in 1899, and to whom I am indebted for much information, said:

> To bring home to us more clearly the grotesque littleness of our present tax compared with that of other countries, I have had computed a table which I shall insert in my remarks, showing what our revenue would be if we taxed tobacco as these other countries taxed tobacco.
> For example, if we taxed tobacco at the same rate that England taxes tobacco, we would get $380,086,000. If we taxed tobacco at the rate that Austria taxes it, we would get $202,884,000 every year; at the rate that Hungary taxes it, $169,498,000 every year. If we taxed tobacco at the rate that France taxes tobacco, we would get $436,585,000 of revenue every year from that single source of taxation. If we taxed tobacco at the rate that Italy taxes tobacco, we would get $447,675,000 every year.

Our internal-revenue tax on tobacco yielded last year $57,889,000.

Over one-half of the tobacco consumed in Great Britain is imported from this country and bought in the open market, and when it reaches England it is taxed 74 cents a pound, which the consumer pays; we furnish France with over half of the tobacco consumed by the French people, and this tobacco pays a tax when it reaches France of 85 cents a pound; we furnish Italy with practically all the tobacco that country consumes, and when it reaches Italy it pays a tax of 93 cents a pound.

If we would tax tobacco as England taxes the tobacco she imports from us, we would have $96,000,000 more than all the duties that we collect by reason of the tariff on everything except wines, liquors, cigars, and tobacco. If we taxed our tobacco at the same rate France taxes the tobacco she buys from us and raises herself, we would receive from this source $142,000,000 more than all the duties levied on everything that we import except wines, liquors, cigars, and tobacco. We could take import duties off everything but wines, liquor, tobacco, and cigars, and still have this surplus over what we now get. Of course, this would not be a wise thing to do, but it simply shows the possibilities of this tax. But it might be well to observe that probably the French and English people pay no tax which is less felt and about which there is less complaint.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Has the gentleman any statistics showing the consumption of tobacco in the countries he has just mentioned, as compared with the consumption in America per capita?

Mr. WARBURTON. I have those figures at my office, but have not the figures here. The consumption is much less in those countries. England is the next largest consumer.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The taxes that the gentleman refers to, that are imposed by England, Germany, and France, are all tariff taxes, are they not?

Mr. WARBURTON. No; I think not. I am very positive of that. I took those statements of the amount of the tax from the remarks of Mr. Beveridge, and I did not verify the figures.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman undoubtedly refers to the tariff tax.

Mr. WARBURTON. Oh, no.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has mentioned the importations into England from this country.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman is mistaken, because in England they do not permit the raising of tobacco at all. All of it is imported, and must pay a tariff tax.

Mr. WARBURTON. In France the tobacco goes in free. It goes in free and is a government monopoly, and is taxed as an internal-revenue tax. Of course, it is immaterial whether it is an internal-revenue tax or a tariff duty.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is only material as illustrating the gentleman's point, of our internal-revenue taxes as compared with other taxes.

Mr. WARBURTON. What difference would it make whether we got it from internal revenue or got it from duties? The fact is the consumer pays it, and he will pay that amount of tax.

THE TAX ON TOBACCO WAS REDUCED IN 1879 AND AGAIN IN 1883 BECAUSE THE GOVERNMENT DID NOT NEED THE REVENUE.

It may be asked by those who do not recall the history of the reduction of the tax on tobacco in 1879 and 1883 why these reductions were made. I want to recall the fact that they were made in order to prevent a large surplus in our Treasury. I think, Mr. PAYNE, you were in Congress at that time.

Mr. PAYNE. I was not in Congress at that time, but I know that reductions have frequently been urged in the tobacco tax by the raisers of tobacco since I have been in Congress.

Mr. WARBURTON. During the preceding years the income of the Government had been exceeding its expenditures by a large amount. The Government was collecting more revenue than it needed to meet its fixed charges, and the question was, What tax should the Government reduce in order to prevent a further accumulation?

Our protected interests objected to a reduction of duty on imports and were successful in preventing a reduction of the tariff. The internal-revenue tax on tobacco was adopted as the easiest and most satisfactory way of reducing our large and then growing surplus. This was the sole reason for the reduction made in this tax at both of these dates. It was not because the Government or Congress regarded the tax as too high; it was not because the consumers of tobacco were objecting to the tax; it was not because the farmers who raised the tobacco demanded or requested it. It was done in each instance solely for the purpose of cutting down the revenue. It was cut down for this express purpose, and this amounted to a notice to the world that it would be and should be restored whenever the Government's needs required. No man can complain if the Government restores this tax when it should be restored.

Who would complain if the tax of 1883 or 1879 on tobacco were restored and the whole tax on sugar could be removed? Sugar is a prime necessity; tobacco a luxury. Tobacco is bought by those who desire, but who do not need it. Sugar is a necessity on every man's table. The Government gets all the tax it levies on tobacco. The Government gets only 52 cents out of every $1.39 that is exacted of the consumer of sugar on account of tariff, 52 cents going to the Government and most of the remaining 87 cents going to the Sugar Trust and our island planters.

The Hon. Green B. Raum, then Commissioner of Internal Revenue, protested against the reduction of the internal-revenue tax on tobacco in a special report to Congress. After stating the amount of money required by the Government and the amount of its revenue, he showed that we were collecting from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000 more than we needed, and then says:

"It is an old and sound maxim that no more revenue should be raised than is necessary for an economical administration of the Government and a gradual reduction of the public debt.

"Therefore it becomes obvious that a reduction of from seventy to eighty millions in the annual revenues of the country could be safely entered upon; and, in my judgment, such a reduction is urgently called for. I respectfully offer some suggestions for your consideration in this regard.

"The great bulk of internal-revenue taxation is derived from distilled spirits—about nine-tenths of which are used as a beverage—malt liquors, tobacco, and cigars. These are not articles of necessary consumption, but are articles of luxury, the taxes upon which are readily paid by the consumers, and no one need consume them.

"I am strongly of the opinion that so long as the principle of deriving part of the revenue of the Government from internal taxation is retained, these articles and the dealers therein are proper subjects for taxation. There is no demand on the part of consumers of these products for the remission of the taxes imposed upon them; there is no public sentiment calling for their repeal. On the contrary, the general current of public opinion seems to be in favor of their retention."

This is a strong argument against the reduction of the tax in 1879. His advice was not heeded, and the tax on tobacco was reduced from 24 to 16 cents a pound.

In the annual report of Gen. Raum for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, the report bearing date November 24, 1879, referring to the reduction of the internal-revenue tax on tobacco in this report, he says:

"Experience has shown that no material advantage has inured to the consumer (of tobacco) in the reduction of price by reason of the reduction of the tax."

What is more unequal and unjust; what is more of a pitiable parody on our taxing system than a law that taxes 25-cent cigars at 1.2 per cent of its retail price and sugar 36 per cent of its retail price? Is it not wickedly unfair? Let us remember when we come to revise these laws that these charwomen who on their knees scrub the floors of our Office Building and our Capitol Building, who work late at night and early in the morning and perform work of the most menial and laborious character, and at a small wage, pay 12 times as much tax for every dollar's worth of sugar they buy as we pay for every dollar's worth of 10-cent cigars that we buy. [Applause.]

WOULD AN INCREASE IN THE INTERNAL-REVENUE TAX INJURE THE FARMER?

One of the arguments that has been raised against increasing the internal-revenue tax on this luxury is that it will injure the farmer who raises it. The opponents of the increase of this tax—those who do not desire the Government to obtain any other large source of revenue which will enable Congress to reduce the tariff—warn us solemnly and with great unction that if we raise the tax on tobacco the farmer will be greatly affected if not ruined. To one who has not made a study of this question this argument may seem very plausible, but in fact nothing is further from the truth. History shows us over and over again that a large or small tax on a luxury of this kind has no effect on the price of the raw ingredients used in the production of such luxuries or on the amount consumed.

The history of tobacco since America was discovered, when tobacco came into use, shows conclusively that the tax on tobacco has nothing whatever to do with the price paid to the farmer. The average price of tobacco on the farm has been quite as high when our internal-revenue tax has been one, two, three, four, five, and six times as high as our present tax. Whenever we have made the heaviest reduction in our internal-revenue tax on tobacco the price of tobacco on the farm has not been increased a fraction of a cent.

In 1879 we took off 8 cents a pound. The farm price of tobacco prior to that time was 8 cents per pound. Did the farmer get this 8 cents that was removed from the internal-revenue tax? Not at all, though the tax removed was equal to the price of the farm product.

In 1883 we again reduced the internal-revenue tax on tobacco 8 cents per pound, the then prevailing price of tobacco on the farm was about 8 cents a pound. Did this increase the value of the tobacco on the farm? Not a particle. The farmer did not receive one penny advance, nor a fraction of a penny advance, for his tobacco.

The average price of tobacco from 1875 to 1883 was 7.7 cents per pound. The internal-revenue tax on tobacco for the first four years of this time was 24 cents a pound; for the last four years it was 16 cents a pound.

The average price of tobacco from 1885 to 1895 was 8 cents a pound, while the internal-revenue tax on tobacco was only 6 cents a pound as compared with 24 cents and 16 cents a pound from 1879 to 1883.

The average price of tobacco from 1895 to 1905 was 7.2 cents a pound, with an internal-revenue tax of only 6 cents a pound, the farm price was one-half a cent a pound less than from 1875 to 1883, when the tax was 24 and 16 cents a pound.

The average price of tobacco on the farm from 1900 to 1905 was 7.1 cents per pound.

It will be seen that the farm price during these five years was six-tenths of a cent less a pound than it was from 1875 to 1883, when the revenue tax was 24 cents and 16 cents a pound.

From 1865 to 1872 the tax on tobacco was 32 cents a pound, the highest tax ever placed by the United States on tobacco. During these years while this tax was in force the average price of tobacco was 9.8 cents per pound on the farm, the highest average price in the history of this country except during the war.

From July, 1898, until May, 1901, the tax on tobacco was doubled; that is to say, it was raised from 6 cents to 12 cents a pound. In 1901 it was reduced from 12 cents to 9 cents a pound, and in 1902 it was restored to the pre-war tax of 6 cents a pound.

The farmer received as large a price during the years the Spanish-American War tax was in force as he did the three years preceding the war or the three years following the war.

If we compare the prices of tobacco for the years mentioned it will be observed that the farm price of tobacco was as high and even higher when the revenue taxes were the highest.

We ship our enormous surplus abroad. The price of tobacco raised in this country is controlled by the price abroad, as is our cotton. The price is fixed by the law of supply and demand. The tax of 74, 85, and 93 cents levied by the countries who consume the major portion of tobacco that we export no more determine the price of the raw article than does our tax of 6 cents a pound.

AN INCREASE IN THE TAX ON TOBACCO OR AN INCREASE OF THE COST OF TOBACCO DOES NOT REDUCE THE AMOUNT CONSUMED.

As I have already said, an increase of the tax on tobacco, or any other luxury, will not affect the amount consumed. Ordinary smoking tobacco, like Edgeworth's, retails for $1 a pound. If we were to double the tax, a pound of this tobacco that now sells for $1 a pound would then sell for $1.08, and a pound of this tobacco lasts the ordinary smoker a month. Do you think that the adding of 8 cents to a pound of this tobacco, so as to make it retail for $1.08 a pound, would affect the amount of tobacco consumed? I do not believe that the purchasers of this tobacco, with the tax on it doubled as suggested, would ever realize the difference in cost, and it is too clear to need argument to support the proposition that such an increase in the tax would not affect the amount consumed.

A man who cares for his pipe and tobacco would pay no attention or give a thought to this additional tax. To double the tax on a 10-cent cigar would increase the cost to 10.3 cents; to treble it would increase it to 10.6 cents. Do you think that a man who buys and smokes 10-cent cigars would notice the increased cost or would smoke any less number of cigars if the price was increased this much?

If you double the tax on a 25-cent cigar, the price would be increased to 25.6 cents. Would this in any manner decrease the number of 25-cent cigars that are smoked? Our statistics will prove conclusively that taking off the revenue tax does not increase the consumption of tobacco. It is likewise true that increasing the tax, as I have suggested, will not in any manner decrease its consumption. Even though increasing the revenue tax should decrease the consumption somewhat, would this in any manner be a calamity? Would the brain and health of our people be at all injured if less tobacco were consumed? But our experience shows that this is not the result. The consumption of tobacco never increased as rapidly in this country per capita as it did from 1876 to 1884, when the tax was from 400 to 166 per cent larger than it is at the present time.

I think I have clearly shown that the question of the loss of revenue to the Government ought not to deter any man or any party from writing a revision of this schedule exactly as he or it believes it ought to be written. The same majority that can pass the proposed bill revising this schedule or any other schedule can on the same day or succeeding days enact another law raising our internal-revenue tax on tobacco to a point that will supply all the loss of revenue that will be sustained by such a revision. Such a revenue law as I have suggested will not only provide abundant revenue, but will place a proper tax on this luxury that it ought to bear.

There can be no good reason offered why the tax on this luxury should only be from six-tenths of 1 per cent to 8 per cent of the retail price, when we tax a necessary of life like sugar 36 per cent; woolen goods, on an average, more than 90 per cent; and cotton goods at 53 per cent. I am convinced that the rate in the proposed law is fixed as it is, not to avoid loss of revenue but is fixed at the point it is because the Democratic Party dare not write it lower.

While the Democratic Party preaches placing raw wool on the free list and a very low tariff on the manufactured articles, when it comes to the test it is compelled to adopt the Republican doctrine of a protective tariff and write in its proposed law a protective rate. You do not dare write a lower rate, because you fear the consequences at the next general election. You know that the industries of this country can not prosper if you write into the law the theories you have preached.

[1] A very small amount bore the rate of 8 cents per pound, but the amount was so small it is not worth while to mention it. It is all included in the amount of collections made.

It is not the loss of revenue that stands in the way of this revision even lower if desirable. It is not the loss of revenue that stands in the way of any progressive legislation. It is simply because we, either through fear or some other motive, fail to write the law that in duty we ought to write. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, an unusual question has arisen, as to whether the Legislature of the State of Arkansas has ratified the income-tax amendment to the Federal Constitution. Senate concurrent resolution No. 7 passed both branches of our general assembly, was presented to the governor after the regular session of the general assembly had adjourned, and was by him vetoed—that is, he issued an alleged veto message. Immediately upon ascertaining that the governor had taken this action I telegraphed him that in my opinion the veto power of the governor of a State does not extend to the ratification of amendments to the Federal Constitution, that his action was void, and urged upon him the wisdom of withdrawing his alleged veto.

The governor replied, seeking to justify his power under article 6, section 16, of the constitution of Arkansas, which I will quote in a few moments.

I then wired the secretary of state of Arkansas, the Hon. Earl W. Hodges, requesting him to forward an authenticated copy of the record showing the action of the Arkansas Legislature in this regard, and, if he desired, also a verified copy of the governor's alleged veto. I am in receipt of a telegram from him stating that the record has been forwarded and will be received here to-morrow.

I also introduced in this House, for the purpose of testing the opinion of the House, in order that the alleged precedent might not go unchallenged, a resolution declaring, in effect, that the governor of a State has no power to veto a ratification by the general assembly of a State of an amendment to the Federal Constitution.

I admit, in the beginning, that in many instances governors of States have signed the resolutions of ratification. I admit that since this session of Congress began four States have reported ratification, and in three instances the resolutions appear to have been signed by the respective governors. But upon that point it must be clear to any mind, especially to the mind of any lawyer, that the governor of a State can not create for himself a power by the attempted exercise of that power. The executive approval is unnecessary, his veto is void.

I have introduced the following resolution, for the purpose of having this body express its opinion as to whether the veto power of the governor extends to the ratification of amendments to the Federal Constitution:

Resolved, That the article of amendment proposed by Congress to be added to the Constitution of the United States respecting an income tax, having been ratified by the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, was improperly submitted to the governor of that State, and it is hereby declared that such action was unnecessary; that the approval by the governor of said State is not required to give effect to the ratification of said amendment; that the alleged veto of said governor is inoperative and is null and void; and that said amendment has been duly ratified by the legislature of said State, notwithstanding said attempted veto.

IMPORTANCE OF THE QUESTION.

No one can be unmindful of the importance of this issue. If the veto power of a governor is held to apply to the action of State legislatures in ratifying amendments to the Federal Constitution, it is manifest that the difficulty in adopting amendments is greatly increased if it be not rendered practically impossible. The number of votes necessary to pass a measure over the governor's veto differs widely in the States. In some a simple majority is required; in others, as in Arkansas, a majority of all members elected. In many of the States a two-thirds vote must be secured, while in some three-fifths must be obtained. There is no veto power in North Carolina. The issue is a new one. There is no precise precedent. The Supreme Court of the United States has never been called upon to determine the exact question here raised.

I maintain with confidence that the veto power of a governor has nothing to do with constitutional amendments; certainly it does not extend to the ratification of amendments to the Federal Constitution. The act of ratification is not a legislative function in the proper sense of that term; that the act of ratification of a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution is a special and extraordinary power, arising solely under the fifth article of the Federal Constitution; that State constitutions and statutes can neither add to nor detract from this solitary source of power; that the constitution and the statutes of the State of Arkansas do not attempt, either expressly or impliedly, to modify, regulate, or restrict the power of the legislature to ratify proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution; that if anything contained in the constitution or statutes of Arkansas can be construed as an attempt to limit, restrict, control, or in any wise interfere with the power of the legislature derived from the Federal Constitution to ratify amendments to that instrument, it is void. That the State legislature can not draw a legislative power from the Federal Government and the power to ratify is beyond the control of the State. That the clause in the Arkansas constitution, under which the governor seeks to justify his exercise of the veto in this case, providing that every order, resolution, or vote requiring the concurrence of both houses of the general assembly shall be presented to the governor for his approval, and if vetoed repassed by a majority of the members elected to both houses, relates to the exercise of legislative power proper by the general assembly, and does not extend to the power to ratify amendments to the Federal Constitution any more than the similar provision in the National Constitution, which is uniformly held to relate only to ordinary legislation.

THE CONTROLLING PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Article V of the Federal Constitution is as follows:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress. * * *

The power to propose amendments to the Constitution is clearly vested in "Congress" and requires the action of two-thirds of both Houses. Two methods of ratification are provided, namely, by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States or by conventions in three-fourths thereof. It is competent for Congress to prescribe the method of ratification; that is to say, whether the proposed amendment shall be ratified by the legislatures or by conventions.

Article I, section 7, paragraph 3, of the Federal Constitution is as follows:

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

A provision identical with this last paragraph is also contained in the Arkansas constitution as to the veto power of the governor and the passage of measures, except that the Arkansas constitution provides that a majority of all the members elected to both houses of the general assembly may pass a measure over the governor's veto, instead of two-thirds of a quorum, as required to pass a measure through Congress over the President's veto. The provision in the Arkansas constitution, however, is perhaps not material.

It could not affect amendments to the Federal Constitution, because the manner of their adoption is prescribed and governed solely by the Federal Constitution. If it were competent for the States to control this, as many different and conflicting methods might be provided as the whole number of States in the Union, and endless confusion would arise. Besides, this would be contrary to the fundamental principles of our Government. That the States can not modify the manner of submitting or ratifying amendments to the National Constitution seems clear. It follows that no provision in the constitution or statutes of a State in conflict with the Federal Constitution relating to the submission or adoption of amendments to the fundamental law can be effective. As a matter of fact and of law, there is nothing in the constitution or statutes of Arkansas which either expressly or impliedly add to or detract from or in any wise modify Article V of the Federal Constitution, which has been quoted:

The power of a State legislature to participate in amending the Federal Constitution exists only by virtue of a special grant in that Constitution. It is a power which it could not assume under any notion of a general right to legislate, for that right is confined within State limits and to the enactment of ordinary laws. An act of Congress, even, would not give it the power. The power, moreover, can not be enlarged by implication or by reason of any supposed but unexpressed intention of those who granted it, but must be strictly pursued. So, when the State legislature has done the act or thing which the power contemplated and authorized—when the power has been exercised—it, ipso facto, ceases to exist, unless it be one of the terms of the grant that it shall continue with a view to its further exercise, which in this case is not pretended. * * * (Jameson on Const. Amendments, 4th ed., p. 631, sec. 583; In re senate, File 31, 25 Nebr., p. 877; Koehler et al. v. Hill, 60 Iowa, 558; Green v. Weller, 32 Miss., 650.)

This eminent text-writer seems to express the accepted doctrine on this subject. February 22, 1870, in a debate in the Senate arising over the question as to whether the Legislature of New York, having once ratified the fifteenth amendment, could subsequently rescind its action, Senator Conkling said:

To see the question clearly, and to see it all, is to see the answer also. The ratification of a constitutional amendment is not the exercise of legislative power derived from the people of a State. It is not a power reserved by the States or inherent in the States; it is a specific function derived entirely from the Constitution of the United States. This is its origin. What is its nature and extent? It is the option to do or not to do a given thing.

In the course of the same debate he said, referring to the power to amend the Federal Constitution:

In the case before us the power from the beginning is wholly different. It is an artificial and limited power. It is a special function delegated in few and restricted words. It is a chartered permission, an elective opportunity. Conferred by an enabling clause of the Constitution, it can draw to its aid nothing from other sources and nothing of intendment, even from its solitary source. * * * The whole truth lies in the statement that the Constitution does give the power to ratify and does not give the power to cancel a ratification. This absence of power is fatal to the attempt to undo a ratification, whether the attempt be made before three-fourths of the States have ratified an amendment or afterwards. At all times such an attempt is usurpation, not because it is unreasonable, not because it is inexpedient, not because it is illogical, but because it is unauthorized, because no warrant for it exists.

The whole process of adding to or taking from the organic law of the Nation is from its inception special and peculiar. The submission of amendments by Congress is not the exercise of legislative power. * * * On the contrary, the whole right and authority in the case begins and ends with the fifth article of the Constitution. (Cong. Globe, Feb. 22, 1870, pp. 1477–1478.)

This applies with equal force to the question now under consideration. The position taken by Senator Conkling was not controverted, but was specifically approved by others who replied to his argument on other questions.

Senator Davis of Kentucky said:

I agree with the honorable Senator from New York that the power of a State to ratify an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is not a legislative power. It is an extraordinary, special, and unique power; it exists wholly and solely by the words which created it, the words of the Federal Constitution, and it is to be exercised as it is there organized, and in no other mode. (Cong. Globe, Feb. 22, 1870, p. 1479.)

Thus it is clear that the State legislatures can not derive a power to legislate from the Federal Constitution. Since the power to ratify amendments to the Federal Constitution must be derived solely from that instrument itself, the act of ratification is not properly a legislative function, but is in the nature of a special and extraordinary function, the exercise of which is authorized and governed solely by the Federal Constitution. The act of proposing an amendment to the Federal Constitution by the Congress, and the act of ratifying the same by the legislatures of the several States, or by conventions, is not a bill, nor is it an order or resolution, within the meaning of the Constitution, requiring the approval of the executive. Such provisions relate to the ordinary cases of legislation and have nothing whatever to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution. (Willoughby on the Constitution, p. 520, sec. 226.)

This doctrine found unmodified expression and unqualified assertion in a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States, February term, 1798, in the case of Hollingsworth et al. v. Virginia (3 Dall., 378). For more than a century this has been the accepted doctrine. In the Hollingsworth case the question as to whether the eleventh amendment had been legally submitted was directly before the court. The proposition to submit the amendment had passed both Houses, but had not been approved by the President, and it was claimed that the amendment was therefore void. The court unqualifiedly held that the President's approval was unnecessary, that his veto applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation, and that he has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution. The doctrine of this case has been unquestioned for more than a century and finds almost unbroken support in the decisions of the presiding officers of this body and of the Senate. (Hinds' Parliamentary Precedents, vol. 5, sec. 7040, p. 1016.)

On February 25, 1869, in the third session of the Fortieth Congress (Globe, p. 1563), the Speaker, in a case involving this identical point, held that, notwithstanding the provisions of Article I, section 7, paragraph 3, requiring that every order, resolution, or vote in which the concurrence of both Houses of the Congress may be necessary, and so forth, shall be presented to the President, and so forth, citing the precedent of the Senate of the United States in 1803, relating to the amendment concerning the mode of electing a President and Vice President, and the Hollingsworth case from which I have quoted, also a case arising in 1865 in which a resolution very similar to that which I have introduced was under consideration in the Senate, held that the question is settled, not only by the practice of Congress, but by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. A resolution to the effect that the antislavery amendment, Article XIII, was improperly submitted to the President for his approval, and that such approval was unnecessary, was agreed to without division. (Jameson on Constitutional Conventions, p. 517.)

The analogy between the Hollingsworth case and the question there determined and the issue here presented is striking.

The power to propose amendments is vested in Congress. The power to ratify amendments is vested by the Constitution in the legislatures of the several States or conventions thereof called by Congress. The executive veto does not apply to the proposition of amendments by Congress, and there is no reason in principle why the executive veto of the governor should apply to the ratification of amendments.

Even if the provisions in the Arkansas constitution, to which reference has been made, are applicable, they are substantially the same as those in the Federal Constitution, and if, as all the authorities show, these provisions do not extend to the President's veto, which is expressly created and authorized by the Federal Constitution, by no stretch of legal fancy can they be held to authorize the veto of the executive of a State who derives his power not from the Federal Government, but from the constitution and laws of the State itself. This would seem conclusive, even if the governor be considered a component part of the legislature and vested with the power of ratification. It could not be held by any fair construction that the constitution authorized his veto.

The veto power of the governor is not derived from the Federal Constitution, but since the provision relating to ratification is a special authority conferred by the Federal Government on the legislature of the State, it must be construed strictly. Nothing can be written into it. Nothing can be added to it or taken from it. It does not refer to the veto power, and I think it is clear that the governor has nothing to do with the ratification of amendments. Even if such were the case, it could not be held that he has the implied power to veto, which is a very different thing in this connection from the power to ratify.

THE GOVERNOR IS NOT A COMPONENT PART OF THE LEGISLATURE.

It appears conclusively that the President is not a component part of Congress in the sense of Article V of the Federal Constitution prescribing the manner of proposing and ratifying amendments to that instrument. This is conclusively settled. The President has nothing to do with the proposition of amendments to the Constitution. It is clear, also, that since the power of ratification is not a legislative function, and arises solely under the Federal Constitution, and can draw "nothing to its aid from other sources and nothing of intendment from its solitary source," the approval of a governor is unnecessary to effect ratification, and his veto is void unless it appears clearly that the governor is embraced within the word "legislature." It has been held in a closely analogous case that the President is not a part of Congress. It is true that in one sense the lawmaking power of a State embraces its governor, because he has the power of approval or veto concerning ordinary legislation. It is also and equally true that the President is a part of the lawmaking power of the Nation. He too, has the power of approval and of veto over ordinary legislation passed by Congress. In the ordinary acceptation of the terms, the President is no part of Congress, and it is only when Congress is referred to as the lawmaking power that the President can be impliedly embraced. The same rule applies to the use of the word "legislature." It does not include the chief executive of a State except in the same sense that the word "Congress" sometimes includes the Chief Executive of the Nation. So it by no means follows that the word "legislature" in Article V means the general assembly and the governor. The word "legislature" in the Federal Constitution usually means the general assembly of a State and excludes its chief executive.

ART. I, SEC. 2. * * * and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

Here the governor is excluded.

ART. I, SEC. 3, PAR. 32. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof * * *

The language in this paragraph is almost identical with that used in Article V. No one ever claimed that the governor had the right to approve the election of a United States Senator or to veto the action of a legislature in choosing a Senator.

ART. I, SEC. 3, PAR. 34. * * * and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments. * * *

No argument is required to show that the word "legislature" as here used excludes the governor and means the general assembly.

Under Article I, section 4, authorizing the State legislature to prescribe the times, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, it is perhaps competent for the general assembly to fix the time, place, and manner of holding elections without the approval by the governor, unless it chooses to exercise its legislative power by the passage of a bill. The word "legislature" as used in this paragraph has been held to embrace a constitutional convention as well as a general assembly. It has even been held that a State constitution can not control the State legislature in the exercise of its power under this section of the Federal Constitution.

Article IV, section 4, uses the word "legislature" in a sense which excludes the governor—

* * * and on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened) * * *

It is used in the same sense in Article VI, paragraph 3, section 228:

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution; * * *

The word "legislature" as used in the amendments heretofore adopted to the Constitution refers to the general assembly and excludes the governor.

Article XIV, section 2, relating to apportionment, says:

But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State * * *

This expressly excludes the governor from the meaning of the word "legislature." The same is true of section 3 of the same article, relating to disabilities of Senators, Representatives, and electors—who having previously taken an oath as a Member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State * * *

If the word "legislature" is used in the Constitution or in any of its amendments so as to mean the legislative power or lawmaking machinery of a State and to include the governor, it is perhaps in Article II, section 168, where express power is granted to appoint in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors. Under that the legislature usually proceeds by the passage of a bill. It is by no means clear that it might not proceed even under this grant of power independent of the governor in some other way than by the passage of a bill.

It is therefore clear that the word "legislature" as used in the Federal Constitution generally, if not always, means the general assembly of a State and excludes the governor. It is well to remember, in this connection, that the governor is not, properly speaking, a legislative officer. That while he sometimes performs quasi legislative acts in the approval of measures or in the exercise of the veto, this in only a special sense constitutes him a part of the legislature.

The word "legislature" has been held (State v. Gear, 5 Ohio Dec., 569) to be synonymous with the words "general assembly."

In Brooks v. Fisher (4 L. R. A., 429, 79 Cal., 173) it was held that the word "legislature" as used in the California constitution, providing that the charters of cities shall be submitted to the legislature for its approval or rejection, and if approved by a majority vote of the members of each house it shall become effective, does not include the governor, as he is not in fact a part of the legislature. In this case the court distinguished between the legislature and the lawmaking power.

That the governor is not a legislative officer and is vested with only quasi legislative powers in the sense of the constitution of Arkansas is clear from that instrument itself, although it is also probably true that the word "legislature" is frequently used to include the entire lawmaking power. Constitution of Arkansas, article 5, section 1, declares:

The legislative powers of this State shall be vested in a general assembly, which shall consist of the senate and house of representatives.

The power of approval and of veto is not strictly a legislative power. But this, I think, sufficiently discloses that Article V, providing that an amendment may be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, uses the word "legislature" in the sense in which it is usually used in the Constitution, and does not require the approval of the governor to effect the ratification.

THE SAME GENERAL RULE APPLIES TO THE AMENDMENT OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS—THE GOVERNOR'S APPROVAL IS RARELY NECESSARY.

Most of the State constitutions contain provisions authorizing the legislature to submit for the ratification of the voters constitutional amendments. Except in some instances where the passage of formal bills is required under peculiar provisions of State constitutions, or has occurred, it has never been held that the governor's approval is necessary or that his veto is valid. The governor of Arkansas has no power to either veto propositions submitting constitutional amendments or the ratification of the same by the voters. This is true both as to amendments submitted to the voters by the general assembly of the State and amendments which may hereafter be initiated by the voters themselves under the constitutional amendment recently adopted authorizing the initiative and referendum.

While, of course, the governor could not exercise the veto power as to amendments to the Federal Constitution under any authority, express or implied, derived from the constitution or the statutes of the State, still it may not be improper to observe that as to Arkansas there is no provision in either which seeks to authorize him to veto an amendment to either the Federal Constitution or the State constitution.

The governor of Kentucky, March 1, 1865, in a message to the general assembly relating to the antislavery amendment to the constitution, which had been rejected by the legislature of that State and submitted to him, expressed the opinion that executive action is not required in such cases, and that the action of the legislature was complete without his approval; that his veto or dissent would accomplish nothing. He also asserted the doctrine, which is now generally accepted, that until ratified the question would remain open; that nothing but ratification forecloses the right of action.

"When ratified," all power is expended. Until "ratified," the right to ratify remains.

He advanced the opinion that the governor was not embraced in the authority authorized to ratify, namely, the "legislature."

Jameson on Constitutional Conventions and Willoughby on the Constitution recognize the distinction as to the veto power between acts which are not legislative in nature and those which result from the exercise of the legislative power proper.

In State ex rel Morris v. Secretary of State (43 La. Ann. Repts., p. 590), in a voluminous and well-considered decision, it was held, following the doctrine of the United States Supreme Court in the Hollingsworth case, that a provision in the constitution of Louisiana relating to the veto power of the governor, identical with that contained in that of the Federal Constitution as to the veto power of the President, and identical with that contained in the Arkansas constitution, except as to the number of votes necessary to pass a resolution, order, or vote requiring the concurrence of both houses, only applies to ordinary legislation, and does not apply to constitutional amendments. In Louisiana the veto can only be overcome by a two-thirds vote of the members, while in Arkansas the number required is a majority of both houses elected and qualified.

At page 649 the court said:

> Our conclusion is that the signature of the governor to the proposition for the amendment to the constitution under discussion is not required by the constitution, and that his disapproval of it did not affect its validity.

Another equally conclusive case, Commonwealth v. Griest (196 Pa. Stat., 396), announced the same doctrine, strongly approving the Louisiana case above referred to, and cited in re Senate File No. 31, Twenty-fifth Nebraska, page 864; Green v. Weller, Thirty-second Mississippi, page 650; and Koehler v. Hill, Sixtieth Iowa, page 543; quoting with approval the last opinion:

> It will be conceded that under our constitution it is unnecessary to submit a proposition to amend the constitution, only passed by each branch of the legislature, to the governor for his approval, as such proposition is not ordinary legislation.

In the Griest case (196 Pa. Stat.) the court said that the governor had no authority to approve or disapprove of the proposed amendment, and therefore his action in withholding his approval was void. The constitution of Pennsylvania was identical with that of the Federal Government and of the State of Arkansas, requiring every order, resolution, or vote of the two houses to be submitted to the governor. It was expressly held that this applied to the lawmaking power in its usual sense and not to constitutional amendments.

The only case sometimes cited as in conflict with this doctrine, Hatch v. Stoneman (66 Cal., 632), is clearly distinguished in the Griest case. In the California case referred to, it was held that while propositions for amendments passed by the senate or assembly by two-thirds of all the members elected to each house did not require the governor's approval, under the peculiar provision of the California constitution the amendment could only be submitted to the people by a law to that effect, and in the enactment of the law the governor's approval is necessary.

Warfield v. Vandiver (101 Md., 78) is likewise conclusive. The court stated the issue as follows:

> The primary and fundamental question is this: Does a proposal to amend the constitution, after having been adopted by the general assembly in accordance with the provisions of article 14, require the approval of the executive, or must it be passed over his veto if he disapproves it?

In this case it was contended at great length that the general assembly includes the executive; that the legislature of 1904 had proceeded to submit the question by bill, which required the governor's signature, and that the mere fact that the same number authorized to pass a bill, three-fifths of the members of each house, is also authorized to repass it over the governor's veto was immaterial; and that in New York, if the form of the proposal is a resolution, it is not submitted to the governor, but if by bill, it is submitted; and that the practice in Minnesota and Michigan is to present amendments, accompanied by clauses submitting them to the people in a single act, to the governor for his approval; and that, as a matter of fact, the legislature had combined the proposed amendment with the method of submission—for all these reasons the governor's signature of approval is required. The court said:

> In every jurisdiction where the right of the President of the United States and of the governor of a State to sign or to veto a proposed constitutional amendment has been drawn in question the courts have, without a single exception, denied the existence of such a right (p. 116).

Further:

> The thirteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution was by inadvertence submitted to the President, but when it was learned that this had been done a resolution was introduced in the Senate asserting that such presentation was improper and unnecessary, and that it ought to be so declared in order that it might not thereafter be treated as a precedent.

From all these authorities, and from the very nature of the subject, I reach the conclusion that the action of the governor of Arkansas in attempting to veto the ratification of the income-tax amendment is a nullity, and that the ratification is effective in so far as Arkansas is concerned in spite of the pretended veto.

Only the profound interest which I feel in this subject has prompted me to present the matter at such great length. The people of the United States believe that there should be a power in the Federal Government to levy an income tax. Aside from my own personal convictions on the subject, which are emphatic and uncompromising, I believe that when public opinion has been well matured on any question it is our duty to give expression and effect to that opinion, and certainly unless a moral objection is conscientiously felt.

It is well known and almost universally recognized that the decision of the United States Supreme Court holding unconstitutional the attempt to collect an income tax by the Government was and is a distinct disappointment to the country. That decision did not increase the great respect generally felt for our highest judicial tribunal. It is regarded by many eminent lawyers as in conflict with both precedent and policy, and in some sense as a usurpation of legislative power by the judiciary. Congress recognized that public opinion concerning this question was well matured when we submitted the amendment for ratification. For 15 years sentiment throughout the country in favor of the adoption of such an amendment has been gathering volume and crystallizing. Arkansas has not lagged. She has not followed. She has rather led in this advance. In my opinion 90 per cent of the people of that State are unqualifiedly in favor of the amendment and would vote to ratify it if the same could be submitted to them. I conceive it to be my duty as a Member of this body to do all that is in my power to make effective their desire to amend our Federal Constitution so that the wealth of the Nation may not remain immune from responsibility in defraying the expenses of our Government. This duty is an agreeable one, because of my personal convictions, well matured, that the amendment is wise and its adoption necessary, and because of the repeated platform declarations of my party in favor of it.

In justice to the governor of my State it is fair to say that he justifies, or seeks to justify, his veto on the ground that the condition of the State treasury makes it necessary and desirable that Arkansas levy an income tax, and that it is impracticable to levy such a tax for both State and national purposes.

While I have no objection to the exercise by the States of the power to levy a tax on incomes, and do not feel that granting the Federal Government this power by the adoption of the proposed amendment necessarily precludes any State from availing itself of revenue from incomes, I am convinced that if a choice must be made, which I do not concede, it is preferable that the power be exercised by the Federal Government.

A State can not effectively tax incomes of citizens where the source of the income, as frequently occurs, is beyond the jurisdiction of the State. It is only through the Federal power that great incomes can probably be reached and made to yield fair tribute. This is true for two reasons. First, in the States which are the sources of the greatest incomes influences exerted by those enjoying the incomes will probably prevail to prevent the levy of the tax. A State like New York, for instance, would be slow to levy an income tax, especially when other localities which are the centers of great wealth decline to do so and remain beyond the reach of its jurisdiction. For it must be known to everyone that if New York levied an income tax and New Jersey refused to do so, much of the wealth of the first State would be removed to the second, and the inevitable result would be still greater concentration of wealth in the States declining to levy the tax. This is too obvious to require argument; it is quite self-evident.

Experience has not justified the theory that taxation of incomes by States is preferable to national taxation of incomes. As stated by the Saturday Evening Post of June 3, 1911, five States, and only five, now have income-tax laws. In 1910 Virginia collected a little more than $100,000; North Carolina's annual receipts from the income tax is less than $40,000; South Carolina receives but $11,000; while Oklahoma obtains but about $3,000. Massachusetts' revenue from the income tax levied under her laws is inconsiderable. It therefore seems clear that in practicable benefits a Federal income tax is to be chosen rather than one collected under State law, if either is to be excluded.

At an early future day I shall ask this House to consider and adopt the resolution declaring in effect that the governor of a State has no power whatever to veto the ratification of an amendment to the Federal Constitution. The question is too important; the precedent might be too far-reaching and enduring to permit it to go unchallenged. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALLEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and the manufactures of wool, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOWMAN, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for five days, on account of important business.

Mr. POWERS, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence indefinitely, on account of the serious illness of his mother.

STEEL-TRUST INVESTIGATION.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 199.

Resolved, That there shall be printed 10,000 extra copies of testimony taken in each of the hearings before the special committee appointed under House resolution 148 to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890, and other acts.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say that I am not at all sure that the resolution will effect the purpose the gentleman desires. The law provides that the House by simple resolution may order printing to the extent of not over $500.

Mr. STANLEY. This will not exceed that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman assumes that each day's hearings are under a separate order. Here is one order for a great many hearings. It will not take long to get more than $500. I shall not object to the resolution, whether it is effective or not.

I sympathize with the efforts that the gentleman from Kentucky has made in connection with the new Joint Committee on Printing. I myself took some time to-day on the subject, but unfortunately found the chairman on the House side was not present. I do not blame him for that. The clerk of his committee was not present. I do not blame him for that. I did get hold, finally, of the clerk of the joint committee, and found, apparently, that they had adopted a policy, contrary to the practice and authority of the law, for the purpose of forcing the House to pass resolutions for printing. It has been the custom under the law where a committee had hearings to order the hearings printed to the extent of 1,000 copies, which is the authority of the original committee, and the joint committee, on request, would order additional copies printed, the limit being $200 in each case. The practice at the other end of the Capitol has been that some Senator would ask for the passage of a simple Senate resolution for printing. The practice in the House has been to follow the law, leaving to the joint jurisdiction of the Committee on Printing to say as to the number of additional copies which were required. That practice, which has been followed in the House in the past, has been the economical practice. The practice which the House will now be forced to resort to under this apparent ruling of the Joint Committee on Printing will be that we will be forced to pass resolutions for printing, and in such cases will almost invariably pass resolutions to print a larger number than are actually required. In this case the proposition is to print 10,000 copies of each of these hearings. I imagine that 5,000 copies of those in the end will be sold as waste paper, yet the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], in presenting the resolution, knowing there is a great demand for these hearings, can not estimate in advance the number of copies which will be required, while if the Joint Committee on Printing would perform its functions it could order a sufficient number to-day, and if additional copies were required a week or a month from now, can order them then from plates which are preserved in the Printing Office.

Mr. STANLEY. If the gentleman wishes, I will be perfectly willing to have him amend this resolution, so that it would say not to exceed 10,000 copies. I do not want to print more than is necessary to satisfy the demand.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. I would like to ask the gentleman what the demand has been?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wrote a circular letter to each Member of the House—I had had so many of these requests—asking each Member to tell me what number of these hearings they cared for. A few requested less than 8 or 10, and any number of them requested 40 or 50, and some wanted to have a hundred or two. Of course, I could not send that many.

Mr. MANN. I take it those requests do not cut much figure, because the man who requests 50 or 100 copies of these hearings soon will be throwing them in the wastebasket.

Mr. STANLEY. I am not going to send that number to anybody.

Mr. MANN. The proper method for the gentleman to pursue is to take a list and send them according to the list sent to his committee, which has the facilities for doing that; but if the joint committee were performing its functions under the law it could order under the estimate which I had made at the Printing Office 8,000 or 9,000 copies of these hearings each day, if required, or it could order less at one time or more at a later time. It is possible that the House is as nearly abolished as it can be, but apparently we are absolutely under the thumb of the distinguished gentleman who is the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Printing Committee, the minority member, I feel it only just to repeat what the gentleman from Illinois has said, and that is that the two majority members of that committee happened to be absent at their homes; and I am of the opinion, rather than that there is any disposition on the part of that committee, joint or otherwise, to assume any prerogatives not belonging to them, that his failure, or the failure of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], to have the proper number of those hearings is due to the absence of these gentlemen, and I am certain that upon their return there will be no delay in furnishing the House with whatever printing is desired which will be within the law and common sense and reason.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted one more suggestion, it would be that the trouble is not due to the absence of the majority members of the Committee on Printing from the House at all.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. How are these hearings to be distributed?

Mr. STANLEY. By the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Upon the request of Members or by any rule?

Mr. STANLEY. If a Member sends in a request for hearings, I will send them to him; or I will say this, if Members of the House will send me a list of the persons that want these hearings, I will send them under their frank, and if I find there is not a demand for all of these hearings, that any of them are accumulating, I will myself either introduce a resolution asking that the number be decreased or will suggest to the Printer that he do not print so many. I have no objection to having the resolution amended to, say, not to exceed 10,000.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I assume the gentleman does not need to order 10,000 if he does not want them.

Mr. STANLEY. I shall not order one copy more than there is a positive demand for.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I was going to suggest this resolution provides only for the printing of about 25 copies for each Member of the House. I believe that is true, is it not?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does not the gentleman think that the average Member will want more copies than that to distribute among his constituents?

Mr. STANLEY. I hardly know. There has been a demand for more than that, but I believe that as the hearings progress that this demand will not be so great. I would hesitate to print over 25 copies to a Member and take the chance of having them accumulate somewhere.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Just one more question. Does the gentleman intend, or is it the purpose of the committee—these are daily hearings?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. After the hearings are concluded, is it the purpose of the committee to ask that a certain number of bound volumes of the hearings be printed for distribution among Members?

Mr. STANLEY. I know of no purpose of the committee one way or the other. We have never talked about that. My personal opinion is that bound copies of the hearings are comparatively useless, except a few copies to keep as archives and as a record. These copies are like the daily paper—the people want to see what these witnesses said before the committee. This investigation has attracted a good deal of attention in the papers. The magazines, the newspapers, the boards of trade, and things of that kind write to me and ask to be put on the list and to send them those hearings as they appear. I believe they will be of interest to the people generally, like any paper, and they will be read by the people who receive them; but I believe if we should bind them up—of course you can send them to some fellow as a compliment, but they will never be read and serve the purpose for which they were intended.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say this: I have in my district 18 counties. If I send only one copy of these hearings to a county it would only leave seven. I have in my district some sixty-odd newspapers. Each one of those newspapers would unquestionably like to have a copy of those hearings. I shall not object to the request of the gentleman, but I certainly shall object if the number is to be reduced. I would like to see it increased.

Mr. STANLEY. I made it as small as possible. I figured on it, and if anybody will take the time and knew the demand made upon the committee they would see that 10,000 copies is a very reasonable request. I will say here those copies will be distributed by the committee and I shall not send more than a single copy to any Member of the House, unless he requests it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Saturday, June 10, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 10, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, imbue us, we beseech Thee, plenteously with heavenly gifts, that with patience, meekness, gentleness, courage, fortitude, forbearance, and brotherly love we may meet the obligations of the hour and quit ourselves like men, to the glory and honor of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11019, a bill to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from New York does not care to occupy time in this debate at the present time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not, I would say to the gentleman, at all to-day; Monday I shall be ready to go on.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, in advocating at this time the passage of the pending bill, I want to assure the older Members of this House that I do it fully cognizant of the established custom that a new Member is expected to sit, look, and listen rather than be heard.

For 10 weeks, as one of the youngest and I am sure as new as the newest of the Members of this body, I have modestly adhered to that custom, and I would not to-day prematurely impose my remarks into this discussion did I not chafe under the insincerity of the attitude of the gentlemen who oppose this bill.

Mr. Chairman, if my observations and experience in this House have made my convictions stronger on any one fact, that fact is that the Republican Party can not and ought not to be trusted in legislation, and that the future hope and prosperity of the American people must come, and come it will, through the representatives of the Democratic Party. [Applause.]

Gentlemen of the minority, your course in this House during the past 10 weeks has been the course of your party as a majority for 16 years, and that is that you have attempted to hinder, block, and obstruct the enactment of wholesome legislation into law, in accord with the wishes of the American people.

For 16 years, while you as a Republican majority were in control of this House, you were successful, but since you have returned to this Congress, with your forces waning, shattered, broken, disrupted, and divided, with your political days numbered, and your faces drooping under the shame of your broken promises, the spirit of obstruction you still have, but the power is gone. [Applause.]

For years the American people have appealed to you to cease extravagance with public moneys and to administer the affairs of this Government economically. You heeded not their wishes, but continually, year by year, you have defied them, and since the Fifty-third Congress, when you came into control, the appropriations have steadily increased from $917,013,523.34 to the enormous total of $2,052,799,400.68 in 1910.

For years the people have seen their wishes thwarted by State legislatures failing to carry out their will in the selection of United States Senators. They appealed to you to give them the right by legislative enactment to choose their Senators by direct vote.

For years there has come a complaint from the people that the trusts and the moneyed interests of the country were contributing to campaign funds and aiding in the election of men to public office who were married to their ideas and bent on carrying out their will.

For years Arizona, as a young babe, has pleaded with you to take her into this family fold of statehood.

For years the American people have bled under the burdened load of a protective tariff. They have carried it bravely, yet complainingly.

Did you gentlemen on that side of the Chamber hearken unto their complaints? No. Intoxicated with power, you ignored their demands, you disregarded their wishes, and you defied their intelligence.

But the American people are a patriotic and an informed people. They knew that your party was wedded to the protective tariff, but only within the past few years did they realize that that union had given birth to such a prolific supply of trusts, which offspring, while apparently innocent in its younger days, under the benign representation of you gentlemen and the nourishing and attentive care of your administration it has grown overbearing, uncontrollable, wicked, and intolerable. [Applause.]

Then it was that the people saw that you were imposing upon them an enormous and an unfair taxation without proper representation.

The same spirit that aroused the American patriotism in the days of seventy-six and sent the echoes resounding into every hamlet of the 13 colonies, that "taxation without representation is unjust," was the same spirit that caused an oppressed people in the November elections last year to exert themselves and retire your party to the side lines, and gave to the Democratic Party hope and assurance of a greater and more glorious victory in 1912. [Applause.]

Can it be doubted that since coming into control of this House the Democratic Party has kept the faith?

Within 10 weeks we have enacted more beneficent legislation for the people than your party has enacted during the past 16 years of its continuous control of this House.

The taking from the Speaker the power of naming committees and the saving of $182,000 in the expenses of this House alone is a sufficient guaranty that the Democratic Party is representative in character and economical in the administration of governmental affairs.

But these two reforms, Mr. Chairman, were but the beginning of our legislative program to write the people's wishes into law. The passage by this House of a bill compelling the publicity of campaign contributions before as well as after the election; the passage of the bill giving the people the right to choose their own United States Senators; the admission of Arizona and New Mexico into the Union as separate States; the passage of the Canadian reciprocity pact; and the passage of the farmers' free-list bill, which places his agricultural implements on the free list and admits so many necessaries of life to the poor people of the country free of duty, is proof sufficient of the good faith of the party and its desire to represent the people.

And while, Mr. Chairman, this House, under the wise, conservative, and able leadership of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], supported by the loyal and patriotic Members on this side of the House, has accomplished much for the American people during this extra session, it is my sincere belief that no bill yet considered by this House means more to all the people than the bill now under discussion.

Since I have listened to the distinguished gentlemen on that side of the aisle attacking this bill and defending inferentially the present Payne law the great differences of opinion that exist among the Republican leaders is made more manifest to me.

It was no less person than the distinguished standard bearer of your party, Mr. Taft, who, in speaking at Beverly, Mass., said:

> The woolen schedule is indefensible, and I propose to say so.

And, again, in his Winona speech, he said:

> It—the failure to revise Schedule K—is the one important defect in the Payne tariff bill and in the performance of the promise of the platform to reduce rates to a difference in the cost of production, with reasonable profit to the manufacturer.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle and in the other end of this Capitol interpreted their party's platform differently from the President when they wrote the Payne law. Their interpretation is the interpretation voiced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] when he said, in speaking on this schedule in the Senate, during its discussion in the Sixty-first Congress, "That the promise to revise it meant nothing more than to look at it again."

Ah, gentlemen, it was just such perfidious actions as this in framing the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, after promising the people in the campaign of 1908 that if they would again elect you you would revise the tariff, and then offering to them the pitiable excuse that you meant by revision that you would "look at it again," has aroused them and caused them to repudiate you. [Applause.]

The American people are justified in believing that you represent vested wrongs and fight their legal rights.

No government can be representative when the people's representatives fail to carry out the people's wishes.

The pending bill remedies the iniquities of the present Payne tariff law on wool and woolen goods. It gives to the people the relief they have desired and demanded for years.

Under the present law Schedule K benefits but but two classes of people—the large owners of sheep and the woolen manufacturers. It does not benefit the small owners of sheep, for the very obvious reason that the small pittance they get from protection on raw wool is more than offset by the enormous duties they are compelled to pay to the manufacturers for the finished products.

The sixth district of Mississippi, which I have the honor to represent, produced last year approximately 160,000 pounds of raw wool. We have within that district 244,949 people. According to statistics, one person uses approximately 6½ pounds of wool a year. There is, therefore, used in that district approximately 1,590,000 pounds per year, which is practically ten times as much wool as it produces. Therefore, in order to benefit one man you must take from ten men.

But that is not all, Mr. Chairman, that basis is reckoned on 160,000 pounds of raw wool produced and 1,590,000 pounds of raw wool consumed, at the average protection on raw wool of 8 cents per pound.

We have no manufactories of woolen goods in that district. The average ad valorem tax on such finished woolen products as flannels, shawls, blankets, clothing, and so forth, is 90 per cent under the Payne law. So it is, that while a very few of my constituents produce 160,000 pounds of raw wool and are inferentially benefited by the protective duty thereon to the amount of $12,800, 244,949 people of that district, under the Payne law, are made to pay each year to the manufacturers of the country for the finished products the stupendous sum of $1,449,175. So, in order to put $1 into my district by helping one man, it takes from that district $113 by collecting $1 from 113 others.

But, Mr. Chairman, my vision is not narrowed to my own district. The 92,000,000 of American people consumed last year approximately 644,000,000 pounds of the finished products of wool at an ad valorem tax amounting to 90 per cent, and the proportion of benefit and discrimination under the Payne law, as exist in my district, is true to a very large extent when applied to the 92,000,000 of American people scattered through every district of our country with the exception of the far western and a few other districts.

Such a system of robbery is wrong and can not longer be defended before the American people. [Applause.]

I have previously stated that this schedule benefits another class—the woolen manufacturers. I want to say in this connection that I do not believe that under the present law the carded woolen manufacturers of the country receive the same benefits as the worsted manufacturers. It is, I believe, conceded by the gentlemen on the other side and is a matter of history that the present Schedule K was framed practically by the worsted manufacturers and the large woolgrowers of the country. I do not know but that Providence designed this combination, because it has been truly said "That when thieves fall out, honest men get their dues," and when the worsted manufacturers, competitors of the carded woolen manufacturers, combined with the woolgrowers and framed Schedule K, with an eye single to the protection of their own interests, and failed to give to the carded woolen manufacturers a sufficient slice of the protective pie, the carded woolen manufacturers "let the cat out of the bag," and then it was that much inside information was given to the American people.

I have attempted to show you how the large woolgrowers of this country rob 92,000,000 American people by the present tariff. Now I desire to analyze very briefly, because my time is limited, some of the paragraphs of the present tariff law whereby the worsted manufacturers are benefited by the agreement.

We find in paragraph 366 of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law the following:

> The duty on wools of the first class which shall be imported washed shall be twice the amount of duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed, and the duty on wools of the first and second classes which shall be imported scoured shall be three times the duty they would be subjected to if imported unwashed. The duty on wools of the third class, if imported in condition for use in carding and spinning into yarns or which shall not contain more than 8 per cent of dirt or other foreign substance, shall be three times the duty to which they would be otherwise subjected.

Here it was that the worsted manufacturers placed their joker in the schedule as against the carded-wool people. By this paragraph duties on wools of the first class when imported washed shall be 22 cents per pound, but the duty on wools of the second class when imported washed shall be 12 cents per pound. The carded-woolen people use mostly wools of the first class. Wools of the first class shrink under washing 65 to 75 per cent. The wools of the second class, or the Canadian and English wools, are used mostly by the worsted manufacturers, and they shrink only about 20 per cent.

The carded-woolen people, who, as I have said before, are competitors of the worsted manufacturers, are therefore under the present Payne law made to pay $22 for about 25 or 30 pounds of wool, while the worsted manufacturers are permitted to pay $12 for 65 or 70 pounds of wool. Under the pending bill this unjust discrimination is eliminated and the duty is paid on the actual value of the wool; thus the people are given the benefit of just competition between the carded-woolen and the worsted manufacturers.

But this is not the only joker the worsted people placed in the present tariff law against the carded woolen manufacturers.

In paragraph 372, which reads:

Top waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, and garnetted waste, 30 cents per pound—

there is placed a duty on top waste of 30 cents per pound. The tops are necessary products in the manufacture of worsted. They are not used by the carded woolen manufacturers.

In paragraph 373, which reads:

Shoddy, 25 cents per pound; noils, wool extract, yarn waste, thread waste, and all other wastes composed wholly or in part of wool and not specially provided for in this section, 20 cents per pound.

Noils, which is a by-product of tops and a necessary product in the manufacture of carded woolens, is protected by a duty of 20 cents a pound. Under this system it is necessary for the carded manufacturers, who compete with the worsted people, to purchase these noils from their competitors at unreasonably high prices. Necessarily it follows that the consumers in the end pay the price and the largest beneficiaries are the worsted manufacturers. But, Mr. Chairman, the pending bill abolishes these discriminatory rates and places the same duty on noils as on tops.

Not only, Mr. Chairman, is the joker in the present schedule operative in favor of the worsted manufacturers and against their competitors, but more glaringly is it embodied against the American people. [Applause.]

The history of the Republican Party reveals that its course of legislation has been for the favored few against the toiling many, and in no schedule of the present tariff law is that fact more strikingly illustrated than in the woolen schedule. By it, in practically every instance, the cheaper the goods and the more abundantly used by the laborer and the poorer people of the country, the higher the duty imposed and the greater protection accorded the manufacturer. By it yarns valued at not more than 30 cents a pound will pay a tax of 138 per cent ad valorem, while yarns valued at more than 30 cents a pound will pay only 87 per cent ad valorem.

The laborer's wife, who buys a shawl, pays an ad valorem tax of 92 per cent, while the fashionable society lady, who is gowned in her fine silk dress, is only taxed 57 per cent ad valorem.

Flannels under 40 cents a pound bear an ad valorem tax of 143 per cent, while if they are valued at over 40 cents the ad valorem tax is only 101 per cent.

The blankets, necessaries of life, that are used by the poorer classes of people, valued at less than 40 cents a pound, bear an ad valorem tax of 107 per cent, while those that the rich are able to buy bear an ad valorem tax of only 71 per cent. The cheaper the blanket the higher the duty imposed on it. Take a blanket valued at 28 cents a pound, and, under the present law, for every dollar's value in the blanket $1.65 is added for the manufacturer.

These abuses upon the poorer classes of the American people are unjust and unfair, and by the pending bill these iniquities are remedied and the doctrine of equality is practiced upon the rich and poor alike. On blankets, for instance, the ad valorem tax is reduced in some cases from 350 per cent to 30 per cent, and yet it has been asserted on this floor that the pending bill is only a sham reduction.

Not only, Mr. Chairman, does this schedule impose upon the people the heavy taxation on articles named therein, but it gives rise by its very terms to the imposition of heavy taxes on many other articles that apparently were provided for in other schedules.

Paragraph 382 reads as follows:

On clothing, ready made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, including shawls, whether knitted or woven, and knitted articles of every description, made up or manufactured wholly or in part, felts, not woven and not specially provided for in this section, composed wholly or in part of wool, the duty per pound shall be four times the duty imposed by this section on one pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and, in addition thereto, 60 per cent ad valorem.

In this House only a few days ago I heard, amidst laughter and applause on that side of the Chamber, the distinguished leader of the minority [Mr. MANN] hold up the farmers' free-list bill to criticism, to the evident delight and approval of that side of the House. He said that the term "all agricultural implements of every description" in that bill might be construed to mean everything from an ax to an automobile. He grew facetious in his illustrations. At that time I will be pardoned if I say I doubted the good faith of the gentleman's statement and the sincerity of the applause of his colleagues.

But, Mr. Chairman, since studying this paragraph drafted and championed by the gentlemen on that side of the aisle, I am convinced that they were sincere in that belief.

In this paragraph of the Payne bill, when they use the expression "wearing apparel of every description" and impose on it a tax of 44 cents a pound and 60 per cent ad valorem, they were not satisfied with taxing so heavy the shawls worn by the laborer's wife, the overcoat of the workman, and the clothes of the poor man, but they desired to make it broad enough to tax everything from the hat on his head to the shoes on his feet.

And I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the criticism of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, that I would much prefer being the proponent of the farmers' free-list bill, with the expression "agricultural implements of every kind," extended by the courts, under a liberal construction of its language, so as to embrace axes, saws, hatchets, stoves, and a thousand other things used in connection with a farm, placing all these on the free list and lifting from the backs of the farmers of the country the burden of taxation that heretofore has bowed them beneath its weight, than to be the defender or to have voted for a schedule containing paragraph 382, which uses the expression "wearing apparel of every description," an expression that could be and has been construed to embrace and impose a 40-cent per pound and 60 per cent ad valorem duty on gloves with woolen lining, socks, and on shoes. [Applause.]

By the farmers' free-list bill we say to the courts, "Construe the expression 'farming implements of every description' just as far as you can, in order to lift the burden of taxation from the backs of the American people." By your bill you said to the courts, "Construe the expression 'wearing apparel of every description' just as far as you can, in order to place taxation upon the backs of the American people." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Under the expression in that paragraph, Mr. Chairman, the logman who purchases his gum boots to follow his timber and protect his health, if the lining is of wool, is forced to pay not the 30-cent duty imposed upon rubber goods, but the 44-cent and 60 per cent ad valorem duty imposed upon woolen goods under this schedule.

Mr. Chairman, it can not longer be doubted that the Republican system of protection enriches one class by robbing another. It concentrates wealth in the hands of a few, while it depletes the savings of the many. It causes the flow of wealth from certain sections and classes to certain other sections and classes.

By the very laws of nature we know that good and perfect health is maintained only by the free circulation of the blood to all parts of the body, and that, should congestion set in at any one part of the body, the circulation must be restored or disease and death will inevitably follow.

Just so with the circulation in our commercial life, when we allow its free circulation by inequality of taxation and special privilege, thereby causing the circulation of wealth to congest and concentrate in the hands of a few. Then, unless the remedy is applied and a free circulation restored, disease and death to our whole commercial and political system will speedily and inevitably follow.

Under the census report of 1904 the wealth of our country was $107,104,211,917, and 70 per cent of this amount was owned by less people than live within my district, while only 30 per cent was owned by 85,517,230 people.

I am informed that when the directors of the United States Steel Trust meet, one-twelfth of the total wealth of the country is gathered there.

Five thousand men actually own one-sixth of the entire wealth of our country.

I desire to embody in my remarks the following statistics of seven corporations of the country, that within the past 13 years, under the benign influence of your protective tariff system, have grown in capitalization to $2,708,438,754. It is shown, also, that within that time they have acquired control of 1,638 competitive plants.

And while these gigantic trusts were framed and have grown under the protective tariff granted them on various articles of manufacture the present high tariff on wool has contributed its just share to the erection of monopolistic citadels.

In the last preliminary report of the Bureau of the Census on worsted and woolen goods the statistics show that in 1899 there were 1,221 establishments. In 1909 the number had decreased to 913. And although in 10 years the number of establishments had decreased 308 the same statement showed that the capital employed in worsted industries in 1899 was $256,554,000, while in 1909 it had increased to $415,416,000—showing that protection destroys competition and concentrates wealth. [Applause.]

The further startling facts are revealed in that report: Worsted suitings increased in price within that time 136 per cent, worsted dress goods 231 per cent, and Italian worsted cloth 300 per cent.

No wonder, then, that with the price of woolen goods increased in 10 years from double to treble to the consumer that the American Woolen Co. and other manufacturers of woolen goods have been able to rob the American people out of millions of dollars.

Since 1899, when the American Woolen Co. was organized, it has year by year, under the ministering aid of the Republican protective tariff, strangled competition and grown until to-day it has absorbed or controls over 30 of its largest competitors, boasts of capital and surplus of over $60,000,000, and controls 60 per cent of the worsted manufactures of the country.

And thus it is that through this high tariff on woolen goods the same fact is illustrated to the people—the birth of another trust that can dictate and control the prices of worsted woolens to the consumers of the country.

The bill under discussion, Mr. Chairman, is strictly a Democratic bill, drawn for the purpose of removing the exorbitant taxes from the burdened backs of the people, and at the same time of raising sufficient revenue to run the Government economically. It cures the defects that I have in part pointed out by reducing the tariff on the finished products of wool as well as on the raw material practically half, and is such a bill that ought to merit its passage through both branches of this Congress as well as meet the approval of the American people. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I dislike to indulge too much upon the patience of this House and the courtesy of the gentleman from Alabama, but I desire to digress for a moment.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] some days ago, in this Chamber, in discussing the Canadian reciprocity pact, apparently went out of his way in referring to my State in using this language:

CANADIAN LAND BOOM.

But there are boomers in Canada. They are advertising the wonderful fertility of their soil and the cheapness of the land and the salubrity of their climate. A few years ago fertile lands in the State of Mississippi were advertised in the part of the country where I live at ridiculously low prices, and many of my neighbors disposed of their property and went to Mississippi and bought lands. Those lands felt the effects of the boom and increased in price somewhat, but after a few years of experience every investor that I know of, excepting one, disposed of his Mississippi purchase and came back to good old Indiana a wiser, if not a wealthier, man. It was another Mississippi bubble—a will-o'-the-wisp excursion.

As a Representative in this body from Mississippi, if I should allow that statement to go unanswered on the floor of this House my people would have a right to think that I was not worthy to wear the mantle that they have so generously placed upon me.

I can hardly believe that the gentleman from Indiana really desired to picture my State to the country in false colors. What has she done to the gentleman that would warrant him to pick her out to illustrate some fanciful thought? If he is sincere in the belief that his constituents, in leaving his district to go to Mississippi, were merely "following a will-o'-the-wisp excursion" or another "Mississippi bubble," I would say to him that he is mistaken. It is true that for the past 15 years great hosts of citizens from other States have heard of the wonderful resources and natural advantages of Mississippi and have cast their lots with us. From the gentleman's own State and his own district they have come—not one, but many have come, and not merely one remained, but many of them remained. Citizens from no section were more welcome than they, and none are making greater progress and better citizens than those erstwhile constituents of his. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the distinguished gentleman is ignorant, and I judge that he is, of the progress and true conditions in my State, I gladly cite him to the fact that in my own district lands that a few years ago were worth $5 an acre are now selling from $30 to $50 an acre. Lands that under the cultivation of even boys yield from 75 to 150 bushels of corn to an acre. Lands that produce not one crop a year, but two and three crops a year. Lands that not only produce cotton comparable to any in the South, but which have made the pecan, the vegetable, and orange industries most profitable. Need I cite you to the fact that in one town of my State only two weeks ago 52 carloads of vegetables in one day were loaded and shipped to the markets of the world? [Applause.]

I come from a district that shows an increase in population within the last 10 years of 56 per cent, while the district that the gentleman hails from shows an increase of only 20 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I come from a county whose percentage of increase in the past 10 years was 65 per cent, while that of the distinguished gentleman shows only 7 per cent. [Applause.] The latest census shows the city from which he hails to have increased only 11 per cent, while the city from which I have the honor to hail shows an increase second only in the United States, a most wonderful increase of 502 per cent. [Loud applause.]

And yet in the face of these glaring facts, which the gentleman ought to have known before he made his assertion, the district which I have the honor to represent is considered the most undeveloped of any in my State.

Surely the gentleman would not have this House and the country at large to think that the people of my State advertise that which they have not.

Her rich prairies, her hills, her majestic forests of virgin pine, her fertile lands of the Delta, her navigable streams, her delightful climate, the hospitality of her people, and her wonderful progress within the past 10 years, all answer the assertion of the distinguished gentleman, and are proof sufficient that when once a nonresident lands within her borders a Mississippian he becomes for life. [Applause.]

I am surprised at the distinguished gentleman from Indiana in attempting to praise on the floor of this House the lands of his district at the expense of the fertile lands of my State.

Mr. Chairman, Mississippi needs no voice in this Chamber to defend her natural resources, her progress, and her record.

While the march of her industrial and commercial progress has been wonderful and the prowess of her people marvelous, she has enrolled on the list of great men in American history as many statesmen and orators, with the exception of Virginia, the mother of States, as any of the sisterhood of States. [Applause.]

Not only has she sent to the other end of this Capitol and to this House men who have taken front rank in American statesmanship, but she has bequeathed to other States men who have shed luster upon those States and glory upon the Nation; and I am proud to-day, Mr. Chairman, to represent in part in this Chamber a State that is not only represented in the other end of this Capitol by two distinguished sons, but which has given to that great deliberative body at the present time five other Senators, "native and to the manor born." [Loud applause.] And here in this Chamber, in this Capital City of the Nation, made illustrious by great men, I would speak to-day to far-away Mississippi and say:

Brave thy men, thy women fair,
Boys and girls beyond compare,
Proud thy records years gone by,
Bright thy prospects drawing nigh.
I love thee, Mississippi.

[Loud applause.]

For fear the gentleman from Indiana might doubt some of the things that I have said of my State, I want to invite him and those of you on that side of the aisle who believe as he to come to Mississippi. The people will welcome you with open arms, and we will show you not a State and a South of negro haters and sectional prejudice, but a State and a South of white supremacy, a South of loyal Americans, a South pulsating with industrial development and singing with commercial prosperity. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, in the times of Alexander the Great the Macedonian phalanx was the invincible military formation of the world. It originated in Macedonia before Philip and Alexander, was greatly developed by them, and then was taken up by the Greeks. For centuries it swept all before it.

This formation consisted of spearmen. They were heavily armored and carried great oblong shields to hide the body. They bore but one weapon—a spear 16 feet long. They formed in close order, shoulder close to shoulder, their spears extending. They were ranged in ranks, close together, four, six, eight, and even more deep. Those behind had their spears extended between those in front. It made one solid mass of moving armor and spear points; a formation at first 4,000 men strong, then 6,000, and at last up to 20,000; a great, slowly advancing wall, flanked on either side with armor and spears and likewise backed.

Advancing over flat ground, this huge living military machine carried all before it; with it the Macedonian and Greek armies were invincible until the former tried to conquer Italy. Under Pyrrhus the phalanx went down into the dust before the free formation of Rome.

The Roman soldier, carrying his lighter body armor, his smaller shield, his short double-edged sword, was quicker, more nimble, could move over the field in open or close order. But when he met the phalanx he had a new military problem on his hands; spears, spears, spears, a gigantic oblong of spears; whether in front, on either flank, or in the rear. They bristled like a vast porcupine. How was he to get within arm's reach of the body of the Greek soldier, for do this he must to use his weapon—the short sword. Then was the Roman genius called upon to invent a weapon that should destroy the phalanx. The weapon was produced. It was the pilum, a lance or short spear that could be hurled with great force and accuracy 50 feet or more. Each Roman soldier, with his broadsword by his side and the pilum in his hand, marked out an individual behind the wall of spears. Watching for an exposed part, he hurled the pilum. If but here and there a spearman was struck, he made confusion in falling. There was a wavering of other spears. That was the Roman chance. The legionaries ran in between the points and with their swords had the spearmen, helpless in heavy armor, at their mercy. One such breach made, there was a wedge-like rush from the Roman ranks, and the whole Greek strength was destroyed. Thus it was that Pyrrhus was vanquished. The Roman with his broadsword and his pilum became the world's master.

OUR PHALANX AND PILUM.

Mr. Chairman, the tariff beneficiaries have been the economic and political phalanx for long years in the United States. They have formed one great compact united body. Realizing that they must stand together or be destroyed in detail, they have acted as a mass, their shields spread, their spears advanced; from time to time moving forward to new ground of vantage; making at all times a common bristling defense against any general attack.

And so it has been until this Congress. In this special session the method of attack on the tariff phalanx has changed. The pilum has now come into use in this Democratic House. This wool bill which we are now debating; the Canadian reciprocity bill and the free-list bill which we have passed; the other schedule bills that may hereafter pass are our Roman lances which we hurl at weak points in the tariff ranks. We break down the spears here, we break down the spears there, we make a breech and widen it with a rush, and then the cry in the tariff ranks is each for himself. Small and insignificant as these bills may appear, they carry destruction. Hurled by this Democratic side in this Congress, the tariff army line will at points be pierced and breeched, and the monopoly phalanx which, so long as it could stand intact, was invincible, will end in utter rout and destruction. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I have great joy in voting for this wool bill. I do not regard it as much of a bill, but since it unites the Democratic side in battle order it will do. My preference was to have free wool and free woolens, too. I would have liked the bill to declare for free trade in wool and woolens. [Applause.] But, thank you, I shall take what I can get. [Applause.]

I believe that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] is perfectly right in stating that any tariff at all involves protection. I am against any protection whatever, and therefore I am altogether against a tariff. [Applause.] I am against a tariff for revenue, for I regard it as one of the worst ways for raising revenue.

But, Mr. Chairman, suppose that we reach a revenue basis; suppose we cut out much of the tariff, how are we to supplement the revenue? Shall we go to an income tax? Some 30 States have approved of a change in the Constitution that will enable us to do that, and some half dozen more States approving it, Congress will have authority to pass such an act. If I should be a Member of this House at that time, I should take great pleasure in voting for it. [Applause.] It has one merit over a tariff tax; it is direct. You can see it; you know just exactly what you are paying. Who in the world knows what he is paying under a tariff tax?

A MEMBER. Or who gets it?

Mr. GEORGE. Aye, or who gets it? For, as has been said of old, the tariff is a device for getting the most feathers with the least squawking. [Laughter and applause.]

But, while an income tax is better than a tariff tax, I am opposed to it. For why should we have an income tax? Why should we tax incomes? Men toil away their days in trying to get incomes; getting them, why should they not keep them to spend as they please? Why should the Government tax any part into the public Treasury? To support the Government, it is said. But to get support in that way is all a mistake. The British have had a high income tax, but they are now lowering it. The whole trend of taxation is away from that idea. The march of enlightenment opposes a tax of any kind upon production. It opposes personal property taxes. It opposes taxation upon the improvements on land—upon dwellings, stores, factories; upon the buildings of the farmer, his fences, ditches, drains—opposes the taxation of anything and everything that comes from human toil.

THE SINGLE TAX.

To him that produceth, to him should go the fruits thereof. This is getting to be the current of thought. Consequently I believe that just so surely as this country shall establish an income tax that surely will the mass of those who pay it become active in quest of some substitute tax. They will be far more active against an income tax than they may now be against a tariff tax, because an income tax is direct in its incidence. It can be seen plainly by the man who pays it. A tariff tax is indirect. It can not be so easily seen. It is indirect in its incidence. Therefore these income-tax payers will rebel against this tax upon their industry. They will look for some kind of a tax that will raise revenue, but not tax thrift.

What tax will do that? A tax on land values. That will do it; do it absolutely. It will fall on privilege, and not any part of it on toil.

This brings us to a consideration of the single tax philosophy. I am a single taxer. I do not believe in taxes upon any kind of industry, or upon anything that comes from industry. I believe the whole burden of taxation—Federal, State, and municipal—should fall upon monopoly. I believe it should fall upon the mother of all monopolies; upon the earth; upon that value which comes to any piece of land not by reason of the toil of its owner—for all improvements should be exempted—but from the development of the community; from social growth and social improvement.

That part of New York City known as Manhattan Borough, Manhattan Island, has land officially valued at more than three thousand million dollars. The island was bought from the Indians by the Dutch traders in the seventeenth century for $24 worth of calico and glass beads. Yet now that same piece of land stands on the tax books at three thousand millions. That is the official value of the ground alone. It does not include the value of buildings or other improvements of any kind. Who made the increase in value from $24 to three thousand million dollars—who but all the people? The coming of population did part; the birth of babies did part; the laying out of streets, the making of great public improvements, the general toil, the building this island into a great center of production, of manufacturing and trade made parts. Social growth and social improvement brought this value to that piece of land. Why should it not be taken into the Public Treasury for social uses? Why not abolish all other kinds of taxes and take this publicly-made value for the uses of government—municipal, State, and Federal?

Now, such action is not so far away. Bills are in the State legislature to abolish the personal-property tax and to reduce taxation on improvements on land. This would involve a corresponding increase in the tax now falling on the ground value.

To tax land values, ground values, alone is not a mere dream. It is not the utterance of a man so far in the advance of practical affairs as just to be listened to for a brief hour and then be dismissed. My colleagues, it is a principle that is now and here. It is claiming the grave attention, shaping the legislation, of the advanced nations of the earth. It is in the Orient; it is in the Occident; it is in the Antipodes; it is amongst the progressive people to the north of us with whom we are seeking closer ties; it has made a momentous, convulsive drive forward in Great Britain.

IN PROGRESSIVE JAPAN.

In progressive Japan, for instance, they have just made a substantial advance in this method of taxation. It has come through the simple process of a better valuation of the land. Japan has all manner of taxes. It has tax-burdened production in a multitude of ways; it has had great need of revenue; it is a country long given to agriculture and now beginning to manufacture; it has within 15 years sustained two great wars, one with China, the greatest power in Asia; the other with Russia, supposedly the greatest military power in Europe. It has large and growing public expense—cost of railroads, for the railroads there are Government roads, as are the telegraphs and the telephones. It has cost of rural roads, public buildings, schools—the school system is ours transplanted. It has cost of reconstructed cities, with public water and sewer service, with wide and straight streets; cost of modern occidental administration and police. Then, since it is in the midst of volcanic nation-making and nation-destroying Asiatic economic and political forces, it needs, or believes it needs, a large military establishment, a big army, more and better ships. The ships it would have to have by its special treaty with Great Britain, since it must by that pact police the Asiatic waters so that Great Britain, its ally, may withdraw some of her own fleet back to the Mediterranean and to home waters.

All this requires revenue, more and increasing revenue. Where get it? The poor of Japan are weighed down with taxation; all production is hampered by it. Where get more revenue? The premier, Marshal Marquis Katsura, found the way in taxation of land values. He put through the Diet an act for a new valuation of the lands of the cities. The cities had grown enormously in the last four decades. Individuals had made fortunes out of rising land values. The land tax rate was very small and there had been no revaluation in 35 years. His act called for a new valuation. It was made; and on this, the same tax rate being applied, brought a handsome increase in the revenue.

TAXING LAND VALUES IN GERMANY.

In Germany the constant cry has been for more revenue. It has not been a cry of "mere theorists"; it has not been a notion of "impractical" men. It has been the problem of practical statesmen; the question of how to raise sufficient revenue to meet the needs of Government, such as faces every legislature in the world. How raise enough revenue? It had long been realized that land was valued in Germany following methods of the Middle Ages. The value was determined by the yield of the land, not its market price. The small farmer's land and the small merchant's land yielded a relatively large produce; therefore it was valued high. The great lord's parks and hunting grounds and the speculator's unimproved tracts about a growing city yielded little or no produce; therefore that land was set at a low valuation. Various of the German States had authorized their municipalities to make new valuations, abandoning this yield-of-the-land process and adopting the market-price method. It worked admirably. It brought in revenue and discouraged the holding of idle lands.

The Reichstag presently followed that same line. It put through a bill to make a selling-price valuation of land, then to tax that. But since the municipalities claimed this land-values tax as a municipal privilege, the Imperial Government compromised with the lesser governments. It divided the revenue so raised with the other governments. Fifty per cent of this revenue was to go to the imperial exchequer, the other 50 per cent to be divided between the local and the State governments.

In this way a land-values tax is raising an abundance of revenue where formerly it yielded next to nothing. Moreover the small landowner is paying little; the great landowner much. Should Germany carry that policy further and increase the tax, there would be in land values—values made by the population of Germany and not by the landowners alone—a sufficient revenue to meet all the governmental needs, Imperial, State, or municipal. Then all the other taxes—tariff taxes, income taxes, stamp duties, and every other tax devised for revenue raising—could be reduced, and, if desired, totally abolished.

IN AUSTRALASIA.

But it is when we turn to the people of our own stock and language, to the people in the antipodes, for instance, that we see how easily this principle of taxation might be applied to our conditions in this country; for in New Zealand they have many taxes, but they raise one-sixth of their revenue by a tax on land values. In determining this value they consider ground alone—what the political economists call the "economic rent of land." It is that value attaching to a given piece of land exclusive of any value of the improvements that may be upon it.

In Australasia they have what Henry D. Lloyd called the "Australasian tax." It is merely a small ground-value tax. It was resorted to to hit the speculators who went in advance of the pioneers, acquiring the land and holding it against use until they got their price. They would not use it themselves; they would allow others to use it only at the price of being bought out. They penalized production.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOUSTON). Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEORGE. With pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. In fixing the value of the land for the purpose of taxation they do not, you say, take into consideration any improvements? Is that correct?

Mr. GEORGE. In Australia?

Mr. NORRIS. In New Zealand I think the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, they get only one-sixth in New Zealand. Only one-sixth of the revenue is raised by taxing land values. Other things are taxed for the other five-sixths of the revenue—largely the things produced by labor.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman for information whether in fixing the value of the land you are going to tax you consider the improvements on that land?

Mr. GEORGE. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, in fixing this value on any particular land you are going to assess, would you take into consideration the value of improvements on adjacent and adjoining land?

Mr. GEORGE. You take the market value of the land—what it would sell for in the open market.

Mr. NORRIS. If it had no improvement on it?

Mr. GEORGE. As though it had no improvement on it; what it would sell for in the open market. That market price is the sum of advantages of the situation. It is determined by all the circumstances; if there be public streets or other public improvements, for instance; if there be improvements on adjoining lots—all such considerations enter into value.

Mr. NORRIS. So that you would not consider the improvement of the land you are fixing, but you would consider the other improvements on other land that had a tendency to put a value into that land which you were taxing?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; but you would not have to bother about that. You simply determine the selling value of the land——

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

VANCOUVER.

Mr. GEORGE. And the man who buys land always considers those circumstances. Up north of us, in Canada, they have applied in Vancouver, British Columbia, what is called the "single tax." It is not a full single tax, since county, provincial, and Dominion taxes are laid; but it is the only revenue tax laid by the city of Vancouver. There is no taxation upon personal property or improvements on land. So far as local revenues are concerned, it is a single tax; but it is not the single tax I am advocating, since the Vancouver tax is very small in amount—not sufficient to check the great land "boom" that is now in progress there in consequence of the exemption of buildings and all other improvements from taxation.

The city began some years ago by exempting 25 per cent of the value of improvements from taxation. That worked so well that 50 per cent were exempted. Then they exempted 75 per cent; and for two years, I think it is, they have entirely removed improvements from the tax rolls. The course of personal property exemption was similar. No personalty tax now exists there. The sole source of revenue in that advancing city is the land value, ground value; the value called "economic rent" by the political economists.

As a result, Vancouver has increased in improvements faster than any city in the world. I was informed by Mayor Taylor during a visit there that the increase in Vancouver's improvements during the last year was 87 per cent. There being no tax on buildings or other things a man might put on his land, industry and thrift are encouraged.

Indeed, there is so much benefit from this policy that land values are rising. There is very active speculation in land. The advantages from the exemption of improvements is likely to be absorbed by land speculation. Against this the people of Vancouver will be compelled to defend themselves by increasing the tax rate on land values.

But this aside, the idea of exempting improvements from taxation is spreading all through western Canada. Wherever tried it is working most prosperously. And nowhere, in Canada, Australia, or anywhere else, is there the least disposition to go back to the old taxes. The people in Washington and Oregon, as you can find if you go out to those States, are looking with amazed eyes at Canada and her exemption of industry from any taxation. Attracted by that, many are going up over the border. Many more will most assuredly go unless those Western States shall adopt a similar policy of exempting improvements from taxation.

Some say the farmers would object to this single tax. But have we not seen in the newspapers how the Canadian farmers from the west went to the Dominion Parliament and asked for the adoption of the reciprocity treaty with us? They offered to make up any loss of revenue by submitting to a tax upon land values. They believed that they would get benefits from even that small measure of free trade with the United States, and were willing to pay for such benefit by accepting a tax upon ground values—on the ground values alone, of course, less all improvement value. Certainly, this is an answer to any who say that the farmers of this country would never bear such taxation. For, let me repeat, this tax is upon land values and those values exclusively—ground values. When you come to consider the values in a farm you find that they are largely betterments—improvements the farmer's labor has wrought. Exempting them, the value that remains to be taxed is very much shrunk up. Moreover, speculative value in the land would lessen. Indeed, speculative value would disappear with heavy taxation of land values.

THE BRITISH BUDGET FIGHT.

But it is to Great Britain that we must turn for the most extraordinary instance of advancement along this line. The budget fight, of which the world has heard, was nothing but a fight with landlords over a tax upon land values. The Right Hon. Lloyd George, chancellor of the exchequer, framed the budget and led the fight. He is, I believe, the most wonderful politician in the world. He rose from the ranks. He came from the Welsh Hills, ate of the bitter bread of poverty, practiced humbly as a lawyer, and then reached Parliament. He came face to face with all the great social and political problems of his day. None were more difficult than the taxation problem. The Conservative, or landlord, party was proposing to revive protectionism in the United Kingdom and so make privilege more secure. George struck at this with a land tax. He brought in a budget in most respects just like other budgets of many years running in its main features. His budget contained a slight difference. It was a little bit of an item—a tax to fall on land values. The tax was divided into two parts: A part was to fall upon the value of land at the time of its sale; the other part was to be an annual charge upon land.

At the time of presenting his budget to Parliament, Lloyd George explained that, preceding the laying of the tax, there would have to be a revaluation of the land of the United Kingdom; that some of the valuable land of the realm had not been valued since the time when the Stuarts were kings; and that there was some land that yet stood valued as it was in the days when the Norman William crossed the channel and took the crown from the Saxon Harold.

The matter of valuing the land was not to be done by public officials, as is our common practice. Under the budget it was to be done by the landlords themselves. They were to be invited to make out schedules, and upon these schedules the tax would be imposed.

Imagine any proposition of that sort in this country! Imagine the great trusts of this country, at whose core is the most valuable land, coming to the tax office and making their own valuation for public taxation! And yet Lloyd George invited the British landlords to do just this.

And upon a valuation so derived he proposed in the first instance to lay a tax. How much of a tax do you suppose? Why, one-fifth of 1 per cent. One-fifth of 1 per cent! Why should there be any hullabaloo about that? One-fifth of 1 per cent! The landowners of New York City paid more than 2 per cent on their land values this year. They paid more than ten times the amount the British landlords were under the Lloyd George budget asked to pay.

Mr. SIMS. Was it not also proposed to take for the Government, in the way of a tax, a part of a sum called a fine on the renewal of an expired lease or upon the making of a new lease of real estate?

Mr. GEORGE. I am coming to that. There was the other part of the budget proposition. The Government proposed to take note of the valuation any owner should make for taxation purposes, and again when the land should be sold—six months, a year, five years, or whenever afterwards. Should the value at the sale show any increase over the value made for taxation purposes, the Government was to treat it as an "unearned increment"—that is, as unearned by the landlord. Of this "unearned increment" the Government was to take 20 per cent.

As for the amount of revenue to be raised under this tax on land values, it was preposterously small. It actually called for only £500,000 on one estimate and £600,000 on another. This amounts to $3,000,000 of our money. What would we say to a Federal tax that was going to raise $3,000,000 of our money? Why, $3,000,000 would not pay a third or a fourth part of one of the super-Dreadnought killing machines that we think we have to add to our Navy, in these days of profound peace. Why, Mr. Astor, the gentleman who expatriated himself and went over to England to become a British subject, could have paid out of his Manhattan Island rents which he still exacted that amount of money and not thought of it. He had just bought an old castle—I do not know what date it goes back to—and he was fixing it up and refurnishing it. He will, first and last, spend several times $3,000,000 and not think of it. The Duke of Westminster, the Duke of Bedford, or any other of the half dozen of the great London landlords could have paid that $3,000,000, or £600,000, and not been hurt one bit; indeed, scarcely noticed the amount.

THIN EDGE OF THE WEDGE.

Why, then, all the opposition we have read of? Because the lords perceived in this small tax the thin edge of the wedge. A small tax rate this year; but with a valuation made, the tax might be heavy next year and heavier the year after.

Besides, the chancellor of the exchequer had in public speeches invited municipalities to consider whether they would not like to take this imperial land valuation as a basis for a little local revenue raising; knowing, as all the Kingdom knew, that London, Glasgow, Dublin, and a hundred other of the chief cities and local governing centers had petitioned Parliament for just such permission.

What wonder, then, that the lords rose up and howled. They called Lloyd George a thief. Worse than that—listen, you lawyers, in this House—they called him an attorney! If there are any Welshmen here, beware! for when their wrath broke all bounds they called him a "Welshman!"

And of the Liberal Party the lords cried:

They are pulling down the pillars of the State. They are destroying the British constitution. They are dragging to the grave the greatest nation on earth.

Let me tell you, gentlemen, Lloyd George and his progressive party were pulling down coroneted landlordism. The tax was small, but British privilege knew its import. The tax was small then, but it is going to be increased, not only as an imperial tax, but Lloyd George has since been making speeches inviting the municipalities to consider the Imperial Government valuation of land as a tax basis for local revenues.

So here we have the way made clear to us. The great people from whom our institutions have come, from whose loins the body of our people originally sprang, have fought down any proposal to return to protectionism; they have reduced income taxation, and in furious political conflict they have laid the foundations for taxing land monopoly. And in all this the English, Irish, Scotch, and Welsh radicals have stood together as never before in the politics of the United Kingdom.

Great Britain has much freedom of trade. They do not tax imports that compete with things produced in Great Britain. They do tax some of the things not produced there, but purely for revenue purposes. These taxes may go before a great while. The land-values tax is small now, but it is likely to grow fast because of those who oppose it—the landed aristocracy.

Why should we not apply this taxation principle to this country? Why should we not go to land values for all our revenues? We get part there; why not all? Abolish the tariff and other taxes on production and increase our present taxation on land values. If the older countries find it good, if the newer parts of the world, Australia and Canada, find it good, why should not this country find it good?

Is there in any part of the world a greater, more damaging, more damning kind of land monopoly than there is in this country? Can you find in any part of the world landlords who are so great, so mighty, as they are in this country of ours? Where will you find, among the peerage of Europe, dukes or earls or counts or viscounts so powerful from their landed possessions as are simple citizens in our country?

A steel trust has vast possessions. Those possessions form the very core of its monopoly. An oil trust has great landed possessions—vast possessions, of which it chooses to use only a small part, shutting all the rest off from use by anybody. You will find the roots of most of the trusts down in land monopoly. Why not apply the single tax? All the revenue raised in this country—our Federal revenue, our State revenue, our local revenue—amounts in round numbers to $2,000,000,000 a year. The ground-rent roll of the country probably approximates four thousand millions, so that there is an ample source of revenue for all revenue needs.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Will the gentleman there allow an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. NEEDHAM. It may interest the gentleman to know that the irrigation district in which I live in California has within the past two weeks, by popular vote, voted to exempt the irrigation improvements from all taxation in the State of California.

Mr. GEORGE. I congratulate the State of California.

Land monopolies such as were scarcely seen before; land monopolies such as find example only, if there be any comparison whatever, in the ancient times, in the imperial days of Rome, exist here. The great Warwick, the kingmaker, could go to Parliament with 600 liveried men. But a simple citizen, a Carnegie or any one of a large number that any of us might name, could, if he chose, have not 600 but 6,000—we might say, in some instances, 60,000—retainers, should he choose to go abroad in such a style.

Whence comes all this? Primarily from ownership of the soil. That is the very essence of these monopoly fortunes. Given a condition where the few own the soil that all the others living there must use for their subsistence, then the few are the masters of the many.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman has alluded to Mr. Carnegie. Does he think he is accurate in giving the impression that Mr. Carnegie's fortune came as the result of the ownership of land?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, I do; mainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to have the gentleman amplify that statement.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Carnegie was born in Scotland. He came to this country and worked as a boy in a cotton mill in Allegheny City, Pa. Then he worked as a telegraph operator in Pittsburg, across the river; then as an employee of the Pennsylvania Railroad, later as its Pittsburg superintendent, and from that position with the Pennsylvania Railroad to back him, he stepped out into the manufacture of iron and steel. What did he know about iron and steel? He could not make a ton of iron or steel. But he had two things: He had associated with him a genius who could make iron and steel, and he had the Pennsylvania Railroad behind him, with the same kind of secret contracts or understandings that Rockefeller had about that time with the railroads for the carriage of oil. Carnegie not only had orders for rails, wheels, bridges, and other structural iron and steel, but he had special rates for the carriage of finished and unfinished products to and from mines and mills. By reason of these rates he was enabled to underbid all competitors.

Much of this is told by Mr. Carnegie himself in his brief biographical sketch. But in his most recent book, Problems of To-day, he describes in exact terms and with precise instances the greatest factor in the production of the great combinations and great individual fortunes. He says it lies in the monopoly of land.

It was by holding a monopoly of the Connellsville coal fields, the best coking coal in the world, and subsequently by possession of practically all the best or most available iron and steel ore in the country that the United States Steel Corporation received material advantage over all competitors, sufficient, at any rate, to force a gentlemen's agreement with competitors here, while the tariff shut off competition from without.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I am not in any sense defending, even by questions, the method by which Mr. Carnegie obtained his fortune. Neither am I criticizing it. The gentleman's statement did not seem to me to indicate wherein in any accurate use of the word "land" Mr. Carnegie's fortune was dependent upon it. I would like to have the gentleman define just what he means by "land."

Mr. GEORGE. By "land" I do not mean mills, I do not mean railroad tracks, I do not mean anything made by labor. By "land" I mean the superficies of the earth. By "land" I mean the thing on which we stand, from which we came, to which we return.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let us define the definition, because the very question of what is meant by land, to my mind, is the crux of the whole proposition upon which the gentleman builds his superstructure of land values and land taxation. He says he means that which, if I may paraphrase his language, is the gift of nature and not the result of man's handiwork. Does he consider iron ore when it comes out of the land to be land within the meaning of his definition?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I do not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, to the extent that the general ownership of iron ore produced the fortune, it did not relate to land?

Mr. GEORGE. I call land that which nature offers to man before man has put his hand to it.

Mr. SHERLEY. In that sense, there is practically nothing; there is no value at all until he puts his hand to it.

Mr. GEORGE. I can have a vacant lot here in Washington, and it may lie just as it was at the time the Indians—if there were ever Indians here—occupied it. I can sell it for a price. Yet not a stick or a stone has been touched upon it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; it has a potential value.

Mr. GEORGE. It has an actual value, for value proceeds not only from labor, but also from a power to exact labor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, observe the Coal Trust. I do not believe that any amount of regulation, any amount of examination into financial accounts, any amount of acts here in Congress for the reorganization, if you please, of the Coal Trust will do any lasting good. You pass regulations and set up regulators, and then you have got to have somebody regulate the regulators. [Laughter.] The only way to hit a combination like the Coal Trust is to hit the monopoly principle underlying it.

THE ANTHRACITE COAL TRUST.

Take the Anthracite Coal Trust in Pennsylvania. It possesses practically all of the hard-coal land of that State. Nature has put into eastern Pennsylvania a great deposit of hard coal. It has been the business of the anthracite railroad companies, beginning with the Reading Railroad years ago, to get possession of these deposits by purchase, by long lease, and by contract for the carriage of the coal. These railroads acting together have in these ways got control of the hard coal of all eastern Pennsylvania. The purpose has not been to mine coal. It has been, rather, not to mine coal. Its purpose has been to limit the output and to force up the price of coal. Its purpose has been to work only a part of its land and only a small part, and to let the remainder lie idle, as though it did not exist, and to keep others from the use of it. Why could they do that? There was no tax upon it, no penalty on their doing it. The law does not discourage it; nor does even public opinion. People do not realize that it could and should be stopped; that it could be absolutely destroyed by the simple process of taxation. The law of Pennsylvania requires a tax on the market value of that land. The actual practice is not to assess at the market value, which would be as valuable mineral land. The practice is to assess it as inferior agricultural land. Then, the tax upon that preposterously low valuation is very small, so that these great coal barons go practically without taxation upon their holdings.

But if we were to make an absolute market value and put that upon the tax books, and then increase the tax upon that valuation, you would see whether the Anthracite Trust could hold its lands idle or keep the price of its coal high. Its purpose then would not be to make a scarcity in output in order to put up prices and keep down the wages of labor by limiting opportunities for employment. A heavy tax upon the real market value of these lands would compel their use. Their use would mean more demand for labor. The price of labor would go up in the hard-coal regions. Because of the larger output of coal, the price of coal would go down. The consumers of coal in the United States would get cheaper coal. The laborers in the coal regions would have higher wages, shorter hours, and God knows their little boys would not have to work in the breakers or their little girls go into the silk mills to help get the family subsistence. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I wish to ask the gentleman a question simply for information. I am very much interested in his statement. The method of taxation which the gentleman is expounding so very ably would result in what is known as expropriation eventually, would it not, of the coal lands? That is to say, the title of the coal lands would pass to the State, would it not?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Probably.

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir. I should not say "expropriation" was the right word. The word of opprobrium that is usually applied is "confiscation."

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I was using the other word; but would it not result probably in the acquirement of the title to the coal lands by the State?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. You think that the corporations would be able to continue to pay the tax and to sell the coal?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; the whole policy would be to use land, not to hold it out of use. Instead of high prices and small sales of the mined coal, there would be large sales at low prices.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. I will ask the gentleman two questions. The assertion was made by the gentleman from New York that under some changed conditions the boys would not be allowed to work in the breakers of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman not aware of the statute there that prohibits boys from working in the breakers?

Second, with reference to the labor problem, does not the gentleman know that in the mining section there is a perfectly satisfactory agreement between the United Mine Workers of America and the producers of coal?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I do not know either one. I do not mean to say that the law would have to forbid young children from working. As a matter of fact, the law does, not only in Pennsylvania, but in California, in New York, in the South, and all over the United States. It forbids children under a certain age from working at all, but their parents, driven by poverty, have to lie about their children's ages. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, what was the second question?

Mr. FOCHT. Is there not a satisfactory agreement between the United Mine Workers and the coal producers?

Mr. GEORGE. The gentleman asks me if I am not aware that there is a satisfactory relation between the United Mine Workers and the mine owners of Pennsylvania. I know that it is satisfactory in a state of war. I do not deny that. I am not talking about that. I am talking about a condition where men do not have to join labor organizations in order to get even a small measure of social justice. [Applause.] I stand for unions. I am the son of a trade-unionist. I went to the printer's trade myself. If I were working at a trade, I should certainly be an active trade-unionist; but I do not consider that a natural condition. It is an unnatural condition. It is a condition where men who have nothing but their labor to sell must band themselves together into an organization, offensive and defensive, to make the best terms of sale they can in respect to price, to time, and the like. [Applause.] I do not regard that as natural. I regard it as unnatural. That is the kind of arrangement that has to be made by men in a state of industrial warfare. The condition I am talking about is of men in a state of freedom; where every man can look every other man in the eye as a free man.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the gentleman will permit, assuming the correctness of his statement, that a tax of this kind would result in the lowering of the price of coal because of the necessity to mine and sell it, does the gentleman also think that such a tax would help conservation of the natural resources?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, I do not care anything about this conservation of natural resources if I am permitted to apply the single tax. If you are asking me what I should do toward the conservation end, I answer that I should not bother about it, for that tax would take care of it. What do the conservationists want to do—keep the public lands out of the hands of monopolists and speculators? Well, if you hit land monopoly with taxation, no man will want to own land simply for monopoly's sake. Monopoly's profit would be gone. The single tax would tax land monopoly to death in the United States. Any value attaching to land would be taken into the Public Treasury and used by all. Therefore there would be no advantage in getting hold of farming land or mineral land or timber land or urban or suburban land unless the man so acquiring wanted to use it. If he simply wanted to get it to be a monopolist or a speculator, he would have no advantage, since that value would be taken into the Public Treasury.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman consider that there is any difference in principle as to the view that the Government should assume toward private property that consists of land and private property that consists of things other than land; and, if so, what is the basis for it?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; a very great difference; for who made this world? God Almighty. And for whom did he make it? For all men, without any distinction whatsoever; and if anything in man's laws belies that everlasting truth, it must in the end go down. But as to other things—this building, a newspaper, a book, glass, iron, things that we see here about us, or any similar things outside—they have come from man's exertion. Their title springs originally from labor. I see a vast difference, for instance, in property in the ocean and in property in the fish taken by labor out of the ocean.

Mr. SHERLEY. Very well, but can the gentleman state any condition of land ownership that does not have a value as the result of man's labor?

Mr. GEORGE. Does the gentleman mean the owner's labor only?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, we are not discussing the labor of the owner. We are discussing man's labor. The gentleman undertakes to make the distinction between those things that are the gift of God and those things that are the result of man's labor. Now, it is a perfectly proper distinction if it exists, but if it is applied artificially to things, then the whole fabric based upon it must fall.

Mr. GEORGE. I said that that value should be taken into the Public Treasury which was the consequence of social growth, meaning increase of population; and of social improvement, meaning the laying out of streets, the putting in of grades and bridges, the erection of public buildings, the watering, sewering, lighting, heating, the providing of transportation for the city, and matters of that sort. This value comes from the exertion of the community and the increase in numbers of the community. It is a public value, and should be so considered and be publicly taken.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I am not quarreling with that statement, that so far as an unearned increment is concerned it belongs more to the community than to the individual who is the fortunate possessor of it; but the proposition the gentleman announced in answer to my question was that he differentiated between private land ownership and private ownership of other property, and when I asked him why, he said because he considered land to be the gift of God and private property to be the act of man's labor. When I asked him to further evolve that he brings me back to the proposition of unearned increment.

Now, the whole meat of the gentleman's position, as it was of his father's book—one of the most interesting and epoch-making books ever written—was that very question. It is the crux of the whole proposition, whether land, as he uses the word "land," represents something that belongs to the community at large any more than the other property.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; the land was made by God, and the value that attaches to it may be quite apart from the owner's labor. The owner may do nothing. Any value that attaches to that particular piece of land is a public value. To illustrate: Here you have in the center of Washington a lot, a vacant piece of property. It has nothing whatever upon it. It has never been improved in any way. Yet it has a selling value and will increase in price. Who made that value? Surely not the labor of the man owning the land. He did not turn a hand. He might have gone into the mountains as did Rip Van Winkle and slept for 20 years, and returning, found a value in his land that he had nothing to do with making. Why should not such value be taken as a public value? I certainly separate it from any value that might be put upon that land in the way of a house or a machine; whether it be a well dug there or a shaft sunk here or a building erected. Such value perfectly clearly is a private value and belongs to labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman a half an hour additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 30 minutes longer.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, this land-value tax meets as no other kind of a tax does the four canons of taxation. First of all, as laid down by Adam Smith, the father of political economy, in his Wealth of Nations, it is the most equal kind of a tax.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Just a moment. A little while ago I wanted to ask the gentleman a question. We have traveled some little distance from the inquiry which I desired to make, but I fancy it is still pertinent, and I would be glad to have the gentleman explain to us a phase of the question he is discussing. He stated that by the operation of the method of taxation which he is advocating monopoly would be destroyed, a monopoly of coal holdings, for illustration. I want to know where the title of the property would go when the monopoly is destroyed by this method of taxation.

Mr. GEORGE. Gentlemen, I do not know whether you heard the question. The gentleman asked where the title of the land would go if we were to apply the single tax in full.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes; under the gentleman's theory.

Mr. GEORGE. Exempting all other taxes and applying a single tax, in other words, the title of the land would stay where it is. We do not propose to change titles.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is, it would stay in the company?

Mr. GEORGE. It would stay in the company or individual, or whoever now calls himself owner. He would still be the owner, but——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But he is killed——

Mr. GEORGE (continuing). Only subject to a large tax instead of a small tax.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But he is killed; you have stated you have killed him.

Mr. GEORGE. We have killed monopoly's powers by taxing the value of land used and of land that is not used. You force the land into use. The power of monopoly is the power to hold land out of use.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But could not the monopoly, having to pay the increased tax, charge the increased tax upon the consumer?

Mr. GEORGE. I invite the gentleman to consider the political economists. This is one thing in political economy that is not in dispute.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Might he not undertake to do that, as he does it now in coal properties?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir. When you put a tax on production, you limit production. Men will not produce unless they can get compensation for the tax. They add the tax to the price of the product, and thereby they get recompensed for the tax. But not so when you tax land values.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But suppose you have an actual monopoly, a natural monopoly?

Mr. GEORGE. I will answer it; wait a minute. By putting a tax on land values you do not lessen the amount of land. You can not lessen it by one grain. It is just the same in amount. But you will increase the available quantity. You will force land into use that has been kept out of use by speculation. This will put down the price of land, instead of putting it up.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Precisely. Now, if I understand the gentleman, this coal monopoly which he is discussing is a monopoly which controls coal lands and is lying dormant so far as the actual mining of a part of its lands is concerned. It is proposed, then, to tax it so as to compel it to dig all of its coal as rapidly as possible and put it upon the market, so as to be able to pay the increased tax, and that, failing to do this, the monopoly must die. But the gentleman denies the monopoly would actually die so far as the actual mining of coal is concerned. Am I right that it would have to be more active and mine more coal?

Mr. GEORGE. Or else give the land up?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Or else give the land up.

Mr. GEORGE. If the trust shall itself use the land it is now holding shut up, then it practically becomes broken as a trust, because the feature of monopoly has gone, the essential part of which is to withhold from use the natural resources and thereby make a higher price for the product from such parts as are used.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. If the gentleman will pardon me just a moment. Suppose the gentleman's theory, then, is correct, and the public refuses to pay the increased price of coal which the corporation has been obliged to impose in order to pay the increased tax, and then the monopoly is unable to pay the tax, does not the monopoly then lose its coal property, and does it not, then, go to the State?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir. If the land contains valuable coal, and the trust will not pay the tax, then somebody will take the land who will. Valuable land does not run around without an owner. Somebody will use it. If the Coal Trust will not use that land, somebody else will, subject to the tax.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The grantee himself takes it at the same rate as the original owner, does he?

Mr. GEORGE. If the owner does not want to use the land and yet, because the tax is too heavy he can not afford to hold it idle, he will sell it for whatever he can get, subject to the tax by the State. I am not proposing to change titles. I am not a Socialist. I do not propose to put land into the hands of the Government. I do not propose Government management of land. I propose the plain application of the Thomas Jefferson principle of the least possible government. I propose to tax out speculators and monopolists and to throw land open to private initiative.

Mr. RAKER. In answer to the question just propounded to the gentleman from New York, suppose the taxes were so high the man could not pay them; is it your idea, then, that this land should eventually go back to the State, and then as the people wanted it the State would sell it back to some one who desired to put it into actual use?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir. If a landowner did not pay the tax, he would get sold out for taxes. Whoever bought would buy, subject to taxation.

Mr. RAKER. You do not quite get my question. Suppose the tax is so high that the man who owns the land can not pay it. Somebody else must take the land, must he not?

Mr. GEORGE. The owner simply lets go if he does not pay his tax.

Mr. RAKER. Who will get the title to the land when it is sold for taxes? The State will get it, will it not?

Mr. GEORGE. No; the buyer. Somebody will buy it if it has any value at all.

Mr. RAKER. I will make myself clear on the matter.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me make myself clear. I did not intend in this speech to go into these details, but it appears that I have got to go into some of them. The application of a single tax should not be a hundred per cent application. It should fall short just enough to leave enough value in the land untaxed to make a basis for sales. This basis for sales will become the market basis for valuation and taxation. Now, if a man, we will say, who is a speculator, a monopolist, or who is "land poor" can not or will not pay the tax imposed, he will have his land sold for taxes and he will lose it.

Mr. RAKER. Now, right there. Here is the point——

Mr. GEORGE. The land will go into the hands of a new man. That man will have to pay the tax. If the value of the land should fall, then the tax would correspondingly diminish. If the value should disappear, then there would be nothing to tax, and the owner would hold his land subject to no tax whatever. The hope of speculation gone, it is probable that there would be an abundance of free land open to whoever might wish to use it. Instead of having to go away out to the remote fastnesses of our mountains to find free land, we could then find free land accessible to our city populations, and some part of the people going out upon it, city congestion would be relieved.

Mr. RAKER. Now, for instance, in the State of California, all the public sales under taxation are to the State. There are no private sales in the first instance.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the Torrens system?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. Now, the point I wanted an answer to was this: When these sales are made to the State in the first instance, is it your intent and purpose, under this single-tax system, that the State then, in turn, after it gets the title, would sell it out to the public at the best price it could get for the man who wants to take it and actually use it?

Mr. GEORGE. The gentleman is asking me how the single tax would apply under the Torrens system. This Torrens system is an introduction from Australia or New Zealand, I have forgotten which. By it the government—in this instance California—at a transfer guarantees the title. That is to say, in the transfer of land, the title must go through the hands of the government, which thereby guarantees the title. The application of the single tax would not change this. The present small tax on land values does not affect it. Why should a large tax? All I am proposing with respect to land is to increase the amount of the tax—now existing—now imposed on the ground, or what is at times called the "site" value of land.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from New York would break up the coal monopoly by taxing the land it owns in its mining enterprise. Suppose, instead of owning the land, it took a lease upon the land of other people, or of several other people, what effect would taxing the land have upon the monopoly in that instance?

Mr. GEORGE. It would fall upon the owner; and in the leasing of land, the man who took the land would take it subject to the taxation condition. I think that it is a very simple matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But there are several owners in this instance, and the mining corporation simply owns the personal property, which is not taxed at all.

Mr. GEORGE. The mining corporation, like any individual, should not be taxed on its personal property; as to the land, it should pay on its market, its real selling value. Idle land it would sell off; get rid of. It could not afford to pay taxes on valuable idle land.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am talking about leasing the land, and not owning land at all by the company.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I did not want to interrupt the gentleman, but I am interested very much in the gentleman's observations, and the purpose of the gentleman is, I think, exactly the purpose I would have in legislation. But what I want to ask is this question: We understand there is a vast carrying occupation in this country. All our coast-line vessels are engaged in transportation. Our railroads likewise are engaged in transportation. Now, I would like to know what solution there is in the gentleman's theory as to a monopoly of transportation, particularly on the ocean. What shipping line has to-day such a monopoly?

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS.

Mr. GEORGE. In the first place, the railroads have the most valuable kind of land. The terminals have a very great value. Besides, most railroads, especially the western railroads, have very valuable lands: Ore beds, oil deposits, timber tracts, water rights, agricultural lands, lands in and about cities. The taxation of land values would fall upon that. But as to railroads, I would go further, and this is beyond this taxation question. I would treat them as public highways. I think there is no getting away from doing that. The railroads must be taken into public hands as public highways, along with telegraphs and telephones and every function of a public highway. We must have them in our civilization. Yet it is impossible to have permanent competition in respect to them. Some individuals, getting the privilege to the exclusion of others to engage in the transportation business, will thereby get a serious advantage over others in the community. It therefore becomes a legitimate function of the State to perform.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield to me for one question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; for a moment.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman answered my question as to monopoly and water transportation. For instance, across the water the shipping company does not own the wharf, but the Government has made vast improvements in order to have a port. Now, there is a company organized that monopolizes the transportation from New York to Liverpool. Its property is all on the water. How would the gentleman's land tax affect that?

Mr. GEORGE. It would not affect it directly, assuming that the company itself owned no land; for instance, no wharf or warehouse privilege. But there would be a very material indirect effect. Removing taxation from steamships and steamship building would tend to beget competition. Opening idle lands of every kind to production would increase demand for such shipping competition, and then beyond this, changing railroads from private administration to public administration would be of the greatest stimulus to competition; for now the railroads feed traffic to particular ocean carriers which they control.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; in a moment. To repeat to the gentleman from Texas, by taxing land values you would throw open the bounties of nature to all labor and increase the productive power of the country to such an extent as has never been witnessed in the United States. This would make a demand for vastly greater capacity for ocean carriage and feed competition.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, in my State, in my section of it, hundreds of thousands of acres of coal rights have been bought up by combinations of capital, and much of the coal can not possibly be taken out, perhaps, for generations yet to come. On the other hand, some of that coal is being taken out from time to time.

Now, the two estates in land are separable and are separated, the farmer owning the surface and all but the coal, which he has conveyed to the grantee. Is the grantee's estate there land, as you understand it, or not?

Mr. GEORGE. I should say that the whole earth is land, whether it be the surface or underneath, or altogether.

Mr. GRAHAM. Would you tax the coal right to the person or combination of persons who owned it?

Mr. GEORGE. I should.

Mr. GRAHAM. And so heavily that they could not afford to retain possession of it?

Mr. GEORGE. On its market value.

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, they could not possibly use it for many years to come.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Mr. GRAHAM. How would you make a distinction in that particular acreage from which they were then removing the coal from the other acreage from which they could not remove the coal for a long time?

Mr. GEORGE. You are asking me whether I should tax land that is at a disadvantage in production. I should, but not at the value of land having more advantage. That is, I should be governed by the one thing by which men are governed now, namely, the market price. If coal is actually underlying certain lands, but for one reason or another that coal can not be got out and mined, that land would have a distinctly low price in the market; whereas other land no richer in mineral, but more getatable, would have a high market price. I should assess the one kind of land low, the other high. I should place each piece of land on the tax list at its market value, and then tax that value.

Mr. GRAHAM. I realize that this point and many other points made by objectors or questioners are matters of detail and do not affect the general soundness of your theory, but in the case I mention what would your application of the theory be? Would you tax the coal which would not be mined for many years to come so heavily that those who have possessed themselves of hundreds of thousands of acres of it could not hold it?

Mr. GEORGE. I should if the assessment were based on the market price. I should discover what such lands would sell for. That is easily obtainable. To find just what that is is the business of people who buy and sell land, whether it be coal land, iron land, copper land, salt or other mineral land, farming land, urban or suburban land. Finding the market price, I should tax only that.

Mr. RAKER. I understand your application would be this: For instance, a man owned a good deal of coal land. You would tax it to the extent that he had to use it to make a profit out of it, and if he did not do that the land would be sold.

Mr. GEORGE. I would not pay any attention to whether he used it or not. I would tax it on its value. It is the owner's business to pay the tax and keep the land out of use or to use it.

Mr. RAKER. How would you make this application? That is a vital matter to our part of the country——

Mr. GEORGE. Let me finish my answer. My belief is that a man who pays a heavy tax upon idle land would very rapidly discover that too much of a burden. He would use the land or get rid of it.

Mr. RAKER. How would you make the application to timberland?

Mr. GEORGE. I would put timberland on the tax roll for the price that it would sell for. If it has good trees on it it would sell for such and such a price; if poor trees, a less price.

Do not men every day buy and sell timberlands? Take that price and tax the land on that.

Mr. RAKER. The owner can use but little of it as he goes along.

Mr. GEORGE. It does not matter whether he can use little or much. If he wants to monopolize it, he must pay the price. The price is the market price. Tax that.

THE CANONS OF TAXATION.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interrupted, and I want to make just a few connected observations before I close. I want to explain that I believe that this single tax would meet better than any other form of taxation the four canons of taxation. It is the most equal tax. It falls upon men according to the natural bounties they have in their possession. The man who has little pays little. The man who has much pays much, so that it is the most equal kind of a tax.

Then it is certain. It is not intermittent and wavering. It falls regularly, so that all dependent matters can be arranged accordingly.

In the next place, it is direct. It can not be shifted. It stays where it falls. There can be no addition of this tax to the value of the land. The landowners are getting as much as they can get now. They are not waiting for taxation to put up the price of their land. On the contrary, any proposal to put a tax on values immediately causes a discouragement on the part of some owners who have idle lands, and the tendency is for the price of land to go down. This tax can be seen. It is not the kind of a tax that falls and no man knoweth how much or where. There lies the land and there lies the value and there falls the tax.

And then it is the most economical tax in its incidence. It lays no burden beyond the revenue received from it.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is cheaper in the collection.

Mr. GEORGE. As the gentleman from Illinois says, it is cheaper in the collection. This tax is not like a tariff tax. That falls upon things coming into the country. To the extent of the tax and the volume of the things so imported is the revenue that goes into the Public Treasury. But the tax on imports enables an increase in the price of similar commodities made in this country. There is not a cent of revenue from this home production. In the case of the tax on land values, the more the tax the less the speculation, and, therefore, the lower the price of land. So that in application, it is the most economical of all taxes.

THE GREAT INDUSTRIAL QUESTIONS.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not stop with the canons of taxation; for that, after all is said, is a fiscal question. I want to direct attention further. It relates to the great industrial questions of our country. This land tax does not mean merely a better way of raising revenue, a more economical way, a more direct way, a more just way. It means far more than that. It means the opening to the use of labor and capital the vast quantities of land now shut off by speculation.

There is no real scarcity of land anywhere. There is no scarcity even in the city of New York with its great population. With all its great tenements, with all its swarming humanity—and within certain blocks there are four and five thousand beings—I say that with all that congestion, the most concentrated population on the globe, it has been computed that there is land enough inside the corporate limits of the city to give to every head of family from one-eighth to one-quarter of an acre of good ground. I am not proposing to divide the land. I am explaining that there is no such thing as a scarcity of land there. There is land enough, but most of it is held out of use. Great areas are vacant on the outskirts, and you can go along Broadway and Fifth Avenue, the greatest and proudest of thoroughfares on the whole hemisphere, and find vacant lots, and one and two story shacks and shanties where there ought to be imperial buildings.

Why is this? Because the penalty of holding land out of use is so slight that men can pay the small tax and yet, owing to social growth and social improvement, and the consequent increase in value, realize handsome profits by the speculation. Some men acquire fortunes in a short time by simply getting hold of a piece of land, sitting down, and letting society do the rest.

This is so in every State; it is so in every village, town, and hamlet of our country. It is so throughout the agricultural regions, it is so throughout the mineral and timber regions. There is plenty of land, but few owners. Apply this tax and you tax out the speculators, you tax in the users, you produce a new order in the United States.

We, of all the peoples of the world, ought to be the most advanced. We have drawn from the nations of the earth their best in brawn, their best in heart and hope; not the old, not the diseased, but the young, plastic with youth, ready to mold themselves into our conditions. They have poured in, as to the land of promise, their many bloods and produced the richest mingling that ever gave the life fluid to a new country. Soon we shall number a hundred millions, scattered over a vast territory more varied in soils and climate than has ever before been the heritage of a nation, welded into a homogeneous whole, with one language, one body of institutions, one code of laws, one democratic form of government. We ought to be the greatest people, because we have the greatest possible opportunities. But what are we doing to rise to these opportunities? We have instituted a condition by which a few own the country. A few here, a few there, practically control villages, towns, cities, counties, and almost whole States. We have a landlordism greater than anything conceived in Great Britain or Germany or in the Orient. We have the greatest landlords that have ever been seen. Should we meet this condition, should we apply taxation to land values so as to break down land monopoly and throw open the soil of our country to our fast-growing population, a prosperity will come such as will dumbfound mankind and give to America the glory of carrying civilization to a point higher than ever reached in the destinies of the race. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I wish first to express the pleasure with which we have all listened to the exposition of the single-tax system by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE], and I might add with what profit we have all listened to the discussion of the question with respect to the tariff or no tariff on wool, and on previous days with what enlightenment and illumination the people of the country received the speeches on reciprocity, for and against. As a slight indication, Mr. Chairman, however, as to what the great commercial world is thinking of the assembling of this body and its work to this time, with the permission of the House I will read a letter I received to-day from B. W. Arny & Son, manufacturers of oak leather belting, Trenton Avenue and Somerset Street, Philadelphia. It is as follows:

JUNE 8, 1911.

Hon. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT, Washington, D. C.:

We thank you for your consideration in sending us a copy of your speech concerning the extension of American commerce through the facilities offered by the Department of State, and we have read this address with considerable interest, believing that these facilities thus freely offered should contribute much to the extension of our foreign commerce. Permit us, however, in connection with this subject of commerce to suggest that the best thing that the Congress can do at this time for the advantage of American commerce is to adjourn and go home.

[Applause and laughter.]

All industrial trade in this country is paralyzed. Thousands of men, either partially or wholly idle, are walking the streets, and factories are closed or working on short time, whilst the several members of the Government, from the President down to both Houses, are spending the passing moment in a wild endeavor to secure a reelection to the particular office which he or they may be holding. Whilst there are other causes that are contributing to this tremendous paralysis of industrial operation, the one great cause, overshadowing all others, is the blight of the Congress in an active and unnecessary session. If you are interested in industrialism, as your speech would indicate, there is no better field for your energy and your eloquence than in urging an immediate adjournment.

Yours, truly,

C. W. ARNY & SON.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE].

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address my remarks mainly to the unjust distribution of the tariff burden, and I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] who has just taken his seat that this side of the House does not propose to go home until it shows the people of this country that we are going to relieve them of those unjust burdens. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman, that if that is the case, and your free-trade theories are put in operation, when you go home, you will never come back. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. TRIBBLE. We will take the chances on that. Your prospects of getting back is much worse than that of the Democratic side, from the experience you had in the last election.

Mr. FOCHT. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is speaking of some absent brethren, and not myself.

Mr. TRIBBLE. As usual, when the tariff is being revised the country is threatened with destruction, unless the eastern manufacturer is permitted to enact a tariff suited to his ideas of legitimately fleecing the people with the Government's stamp of approval on his greed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I charge no personal dishonesty to his methods. I grant you the system of protection has become almost a fixture under Republican rule of many years and has become almost a part of our national life. Though oppressive to the poor—the wage earner, the farmer, and the great mass of people—though dangerous to our liberties and future prosperity, still the system can not with safety to our great national demands be stricken down with one stroke of the pen.

The wool schedule has furnished the field on which many battles have been fought. I have no desire to retard the prosperity of any section of this Union; I have no desire to tear down any manufacturing enterprise in any part of this Union; but, sir, for one I will not stand for a policy that deprives the great mass of people of the comforts of warmth in this rigorous climate in order to protect the giant wool manufacturing companies in their unreasonable demands to exclude foreign woolen goods from this country so that they may force the American people to pay their trust prices for blankets and other comforts from wool products. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The policy of Republican protection has already placed the wealth of this country in the hands of a few men and corporations. It is astounding to know that 90 per cent of the property of this country is owned by 1 per cent of the families. This condition has grown up under your infamous protected system. You have fostered combinations and trusts until the trusts actually demand control of legislation instead of submitting to legislative control. All Americans must concede that we are facing a dangerous crisis in the history of this Government. When the trusts are threatened with extermination they openly defy you and threaten to destroy the prosperity of the country by precipitating panics and depressing business, and many people fear their threats. If they have grown so bold and strong as to cause alarm when they are pursued, then I call on every Representative in this House to be a party to striking a blow that their power may cease to grow stronger.

You have pretended all of these years in political campaigns and in your literature that your protected-policy system was for the purpose of shielding infant industries. This doctrine was promulgated by the great apostle of protection, Henry Clay.

Instead of pursuing this policy in legislation you have protected the manufacturers of the East, the weavers of fine goods and fabrics; you have permitted them to juggle with the tariff regulations, and often placed both specific and ad valorem duties on such goods as they select, until you have driven foreign trade from our shores in many classes of goods, and you have almost driven American vessels from the seas. Instead of protecting infant manufactories, as you pretended to the people, you have protected the ancient mills. The manufactories that have been under the wing of your protecting care have grown out of their swaddling long years ago and have become giant corporations and trusts hoary with age. You preached protection of infant industries all these years, and yet the southern mills, many in their infancy, making coarse goods and yarns are discriminated against. Every page of the Payne-Aldrich tariff shows the hand of the eastern mills making specific taxes suited to the peculiar needs of the various fabrics manufactured by them. You have built around this country a tariff wall, placing the power of wealth in the hands of a few men, thus dwarfing the power of the common people. In the season of prosperity through which we have been passing the poor, instead of bettering their condition, have grown poorer, thus exemplifying the annunciation of our Master that "unto him that hath it shall be given and to him that hath not it shall be taken away, even that which he hath."

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party will support this bill, and the people will approve our action in so doing. It is in keeping with our pledges to the people. It may not come up to the perfect ideal of many of us, but still it appeals to everyone as a business measure progressing along lines of a wise policy. It is not radical. It carries out the doctrine of gradual reduction promulgated by the Democratic Party. The Democratic hosts all over the country are calling for gradual business reduction of the tariff, keeping an eye on the National Treasury at the same time. I desire to say, explanatory of my personal position, the reduction on wool and woolen goods falls short of what I would have made it had I drawn the bill.

It should not be forgotten, however, that in detail work on a great measure like this, where there are 227 individual minds, concessions must be made with no sacrifice of party principles. I favor this bill because I feel I am helping my people this much to secure the comforts of life with less money. It can not be truthfully claimed that the bill does violence to the wool and woolen industries that have grown up under the protective-tariff system. Is it right to put farm products on the free list and reach out a helping hand to the wool manufacturers? The Democratic Party is opposed to protective tariff on both raw material and manufactured goods. The platform of the party commissioned us to reduce the tariff gradually. In the Sixty-first Congress the Republicans bore a commission to revise the tariff downward. Instead of being faithful to their trust, that party revised the tariff and shot it upward. Then the people shot them outward. [Applause.] In consequence the Republican Party has been almost demolished. Shall we stand by our party mandates and give the people material and gradual reduction, or shall we ignore the platform of the party? From the day of Adam to the present time disobedience has been disastrous. The children of Israel, on account of disobedience to the law of God, wandered in the wilderness 38 years. Party platform is my master, and I am its servant. We have elected our leaders, and if these leaders, in drafting the bill, follow the party mandates, and the caucus of the party so decide, then I shall support the bill. I am not going off after strange doctrines. The old Democratic doctrine is good enough for me. Our sojourn in the wilderness for 16 years in pursuit of strange theories is long enough for me. Personally I have faith in the gentleman from Alabama, the leader on this side of the House. My faith is so strong in his honesty, his wisdom, and his statesmanship that I believe his name will be written on the pages of history as one of the greatest statesmen of this era, and though he lives in forbidden territory of the South, still I hope to see him elected President of these United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You can not jump from one extreme to another without paralyzing the business of the Nation. The country is confronted with a condition; we are legislating to meet the pressing demands of that condition. The condition we confront was thrust upon us by long years of Republican rule. Many of us would like to see free wool, but do the conditions authorize it? The committee, after long deliberations and thorough investigation, answers no, and the caucus of the Democratic Party, after careful study, has adopted that view; and I feel that the Democratic Party in this House should rally unanimously to the party action. The bill reduces both raw wool and manufactured goods alike. The thing of most interest to my people in the formation of this legislation is the finished manufactured goods. They wear the finished goods in clothing and protect themselves from cold with the manufactured goods.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to demonstrate the real facts by comparing this bill with the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, and by actual calculations show the difference as they affect the great mass of people. These illustrations will show that the poor people pay much more duty on the goods they use of the same class than the rich man pays for the goods he uses. First, I will demonstrate the truth of this assertion by pointing out the duty on different grades of alpaca. The cheap grades are used by those less able to pay the high prices, and the higher grades are used by the wealthy class. Paragraph 380 provides that dress goods and linings, when composed of wool in the weft and cotton in the warp, weighing less than 4 ounces to the square yard and costing less than 15 cents per square yard and less than 70 cents per pound, shall pay a duty of 7 cents per square yard and 50 cents ad valorem; costing more than 15 cents per square yard and more than 70 cents per pound shall pay 8 cents per square yard and 55 cents ad valorem. Take a piece of alpaca costing 10 cents per yard: The specific duty is 7 cents, ad valorem 5 cents, combined duty 12 cents. Divide the 12 by 10, the price of the goods, this will give you 120 per cent on the cheap goods. Take the real alpaca, at 40 cents per yard: Specific duty 8 cents, ad valorem duty 22 cents, combined duty 30 cents. Divide the combined duty by 40, the price of the goods, this gives you 75 per cent duty. This shows you 45 per cent more on the cheap goods.

Price 10 cents per yard:	Cents.
Specific duty	7
Ad valorem duty	5
Combined duty	12

12÷10=120 per cent.

Price 40 cents per yard:
Specific duty	8
Ad valorem duty	22

30÷40=75 per cent.

In reading the section you naturally gather the idea that the high-class goods carry more duty. Notice 12 cents combined duty on cheap alpaca and 22 combined duty on high alpaca, but the investigation should not stop there; dividing the price of the goods by the duty which obtains gives proper results. This may sound commonplace to some broad-minded statesman on the floor of this House, but I am attempting to explain this iniquitous tariff and make it so clear that the little boys of the whole country may understand the deception in the wording of many Republican tariff schedules.

Furthermore, I desire to give a practical application of the Payne bill, and will ask you to go with me into a mercantile establishment and we will be spectators in the sales. Two women walk up to the counter; one is a poor woman; she brings the daily earnings of her husband, and not being able to buy high-class goods she calls for 10-cent alpaca. The other woman standing near her, having a large bank account and able to pay, calls for 40-cent alpaca. We, the spectators of the trade, see the poor woman pass over the counter 45 per cent more per yard on her purchase than the woman of wealth. How can you face your constituents and ask their support with such an infamous tariff record as this? My illustrations and old-field schoolhouse calculations may not appeal to the fastidious as polished oratory, but I am appealing to common sense.

Mr. ADAIR. The illustrations reach home.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I hope they will.

Second illustration: Section 378 of the Payne bill—knit fabrics, and so forth, weighing 12 ounces per yard and costing 50 cents per yard, pay a duty of 44 cents per pound, specific, and 50 per cent ad valorem. First illustrate with 50 cents per yard: The specific duty on this is 33 cents; ad valorem duty, 25 cents; combined duty, 58 cents. Dividing this by 50, the cost price, gives you 116 per cent duty.

Next, take a yard costing $1: The specific duty would be 33 cents; ad valorem duty, 55 cents; combined duty, 88 cents. Dividing this by $1 gives 88 per cent duty. Go through the same process with 1 yard costing $1.50: Specific duty, 33 cents; ad valorem duty, 62½ cents; combined duty, 95½ cents. Divide this by $1.50; this will give you 63¾ per cent.

In passing from the 50 cents per yard to $1.50 per yard the duty is 54 cents less on the high-class goods.

Price 50 cents per yard:	Cents.
Specific duty	33
Ad valorem duty	25
Combined duty	58
58÷50=116 per cent.
Price $1 per yard:
Specific duty	33
Ad valorem duty	55
Combined duty	88
88÷1=88 per cent.
Price $1.50 per yard:
Specific duty	33
Ad valorem duty	62½
Combined duty	95½
95½÷1.50=63¾ per cent.

In summing up these illustrations and making the same estimates on the same class of goods contained in the Democratic measure now before the House you will see the average reduction in section 380 is 65 per cent, and on section 378 the average reduction is 76 per cent. It is a mystery how the Republican Party has had the face to stand before the common people of this land, seeking their support, with such an iniquitous tariff bill on the books.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. I understood the gentleman a moment ago to say that he did not believe in using harsh language.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Suppose one of your Georgia farmers was held up in the road and his money taken away from him; what would you call that in Georgia?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I would call that robbery. Do you think that is the way the Republican Party has been doing on the tariff question—just robbing the people?

Mr. RAKER. From the gentleman's argument, that is what I would gather he is trying to convince the public.

Mr. TRIBBLE. All right; I am giving the public facts. Reciprocity with Canada, the farmers' free list, and the woolen schedule discriminate against no section or State—they are uniform. The farmers' free list not only benefits the farmers, but it carries its blessings into the homes of 35,000,000 people who own no homes. There are millions upon millions of our citizens whose daily earnings go for food, clothing, and rent. These have been paying tribute not only to the millionaire trusts, but the Republican tariff policies force the burdens of the Government's tax upon them, the people least able to bear it.

It is estimated that the wealth of this country, being owned by a few men and corporations, pays only one-twelfth of the tax necessary to support the Government, while the people who own a little or no property pay eleven-twelfths, therefore the poor of the country pay the taxes when, as a matter of justice, wealth should bear its part and not make taxes the poor man's burden.

We have promised the people to reduce the tariff on the necessaries of life, and let us not be sidetracked by this vociferous call from certain sources for more pensions. I would remind you that increased debt and reduction of tariff are not companions. One is the call of the people, the other a protectionist's snare.

Should the taxes be raised by direct taxation and all tariff duties removed, you would hear the greatest howl ever raised in this country, coming from the trust and corporations and men of wealth against government extravagance. I am not favoring this method of tax, but only illustrating in this way. Then you would hear no more of pensions on the floor of this House. As it is now, the interests are delighted with extravagance—pensions and other forms of appropriations. The delight of their lives is to hear of a deficit in the Treasury, for this means the continuation of the tariff laws and the handing over to them of more protective bouquets, thus perpetuating their infamous system.

As a matter of truth the great mass of American people—North, East, South, and West—do not want an increased pension debt. It is the interested pensioner, holding the balance of power in many States, backed by the manufacturing trusts, who would deplete the Treasury for selfish political purposes. The tax-burdened citizen can not understand why pension rolls continue to increase, although the Civil War ended 46 years ago.

Some gentlemen on this floor have seen fit to refer to the apparent solicitude of the House for the farmers. This was said in levity, no doubt, but, sir, it is time for every man in this House to turn his attention to farm prosperity. The farmer produces the wealth of the Nation; he carries its burdens on his shoulders; in time of war the ring of his hammer is heard no more on the peaceful highways of his home; his plowshare stands in the field where first he heard the bugle call; he answered that call; has gone to the front; and bivouacs on the field of battle. God forbid that I should mention his name on the floor of this House except with proper deference. Often he labors himself upon the farm, but he is the man for a' that. Often his clothes are soiled with honest toil, but he is the man for a' that. He seeks no graft, he forms no trusts, but he is the backbone of this country, and I warn both sides of this House that the time has come when the farmer will be heard in his reasonable demands. On national questions he is the best-informed man of the land, and is tired of political harangue. He has seen with sinking heart the wealth of the country absorbed by a few men. He knows the Republican Party is responsible, and he knows that party is joined to its idols—the trusts and the corporate interests. He knows this condition imperils the liberties of his children and threatens the foundation of our national life, therefore the great army of farmers has turned from that party in mass and look to the rising sun of Democracy with hope, demanding rational business methods in the government of this Republic. The cry of depression and panics resulting from Democratic rule is the cry of fanaticism. Already the trusts are on the retreat; the hand of the avenger is upon them. It is apparent to all the country that the Democratic Party is dealing cautiously with the tariff question. There is not a man in the House more anxious than I to give the people an honest reduction on the necessaries of life, but, sir, I see danger in depleting the Treasury of the necessary amount to run the Government economically. If the Democratic Party pursues the course of reducing tariff on revenue articles and thus depletes the Treasury without providing revenue to take the place from some source, then the party will make a serious mistake. Sad experience in the past has taught well this lesson, and in passing the Canadian reciprocity, the farmers' free list, and in the formation of this bill the committee has kept an eye on the Treasury. We did not make the debt for which we are called upon to supply the revenue to pay.

Permit me to point to other iniquities of the Republican tariff which we have removed in the Democratic measure. The Payne-Aldrich bill placed the burden on the necessaries and not the luxuries.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. A few moments ago you suggested your sympathy in behalf of the farmers and you now express yourself as being in favor of reducing the cost of living.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Now, that seems a little inconsistent to me. I thought the farmers depend for their prosperity upon the price of the things that go into the cost of living.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I desire to answer the gentleman's questions in full, and I am glad he mentioned this, and I will show you
